In New York rapid transit continues to be a success. The new Sixth avenue line is said to be carrying an average of twenty thousand passengers a day, and the East Side road is rapidly approaching completion. The "old original" elevated road this week barely escaped a terrible catastrophe on Greenwich street. A lot of young ragmuffins filled an old sack with stones, and climbing up to the track by one of the supporting pillars, fastened the sack across one of the rails, presumably for the fun of seeing a train full of people sent crashing down into the street twenty feet below. Fortunately the obstruction was seen and removed in time to prevent this catastrophe. The ringleader of this band of miniature train-wreckers has reached the mature age of ten years. He will make an invaluable member of society if he lives long enough.

Are news-stands a nuisance and an obstruction to the streets? That is one of the leading questions of the day here, and one which has raised a tempest in the municipal tea-pot. Some weeks ago the Common Council passed an ordinance authorizing the erection of one of the obnoxious structures on a certain street corner. Property owners objected and a "muss" was the result. Judge Hackett's attention was called to the subject and he in turn instructed the Grand Jury in matter in such a manner that they promptly found a true bill against the sixteen offending aldermen. The latter became alarmed and retained half a dozen lawyers, among whom was David Dudley Field, to protect them against the Nemesis of public opinion. Their counsel made the usual motion to quash the indictment on technical grounds, and, after a hard fight, have succeeded. The aimermen breathe freely again; but they have had their lesson and have learned a little wholesome respect for the laws, which they very much needed.

Liver is King.

The Liver is the imperial organ of the whole human system, as it controls the life, health and happiness of man. When it is disturbed in its proper action, all kinds of ailments are the natural result. The digestion of food, the movements of the heart and blood, the action of the brain and nervous system, are all immediately connected with the workings of the Liver. It has been successfully proved that Green's August Flower is unequalled in curing all persons afflicted with Dyspepsia or Liver Complaint, and all the numerous symptoms that result from an unhealthy condition of the Liver and Stomach. Sample bottles to try, 10 cents. Positively sold in all towns on the Western Continent. Three doses will prove that it is just what you want. For sale by Geo. W. Crouter.

THE INVESTIGATION.

THE Committee resumed its session, on the morning of the 13th.

The Chairman presented a letter which he had caused to be sent to Mr Matthews, with the answer, in which he stated that the Committee did not desire to interfere in any way with his duties as Surveyor, and that there would be every disposition to grant his reasonable request in respect to the time of his attendance.

Mr. J. E. Anderson was re-sworn and questioned relative to the appointment of his brother to a position in the Philadelphia Custom House. He stated in accordance to what he had told the Committee, that he would withdraw all claims he might have upon the Administration if he appointing power made, and gave a letter to that effect. Witness produced a letter to Israel Allen Anderson stating that he was Supervisor of Revenue, in which he announced that ball-dooing was going on in the parish.

Cross-examined, he said he derived his impressions from the statements of his Republican friends. He had called upon Gov. Kellogg after his return from Congress, and advised that the election to be allowed to go by default, as a basis for a claim of wholesale intimidation. The Republicans of the parish thought the election could be carried by fraud, and he opposed all such methods. In explanation of his testimony before the Senate Committee, he said he had made as good a Republican case as he could. Witness closely remembered the circumstances attending the Weber appointment, and read the signature of Weber, but had been misled thereby.

Jas. A. Bolden, an Accountant Clerk in the Custom House in New Orleans, stated that Sheldon entered the service Oct. 16, 1875, under the administration of Gen. Grant. He was discharged April 1, 1877, and appointed special agent April 17, 1877. In regard to Bonnett, his recommendations were signed by Senators McEnery, Hunt, and others.

Ex-Congressman Darrell testified that he first became acquainted with Matthews in New Orleans. Had visited him to urge the appointment of Packwell as Collector of the Port of New Orleans. At first he opposed the appointment, but after Anderson had seen him he withdrew his opposition, but said the President did not want Packwell appointed. Packwell had applied to Darrell, and his own influence were the reasons why Matthews change's. After Packard was counted out, some of his friends had proposed fusion with the Democrats, and Anderson and Matthews had promised to help him. Witness knew Nix. Nash had been for Packwell in January, at which time he told him he had the Secretary's letter, and that Anderson was to be U. S. Judge. She had counted subsequently, that she had it, he believed Anderson had a copy, and perhaps others. He had talked with Matthews in March last, and he had told him Nash was to be appointed Collector's house-keeper at his account, and that Sherman had never written the letter Anderson claimed he had. Sundry letters from witness to Packwell were exhibited and read, in February, 1876. Packwell had informed that negotiations were pending between witness and Packwell and his friends in New York, by which the democrats had letters to Anderson, and witness desired to be surrendered, and had become unnecessary. Anderson had subsequently told him that he had sent it to Packwell. Also that the papers would be used to influence Hayes' action in the south. He therefore written a letter, on the 3d of March, to the effect that if what he had been written was the case, Anderson, Witness stated further that he should not be associating with Packwell, nor that he should be appointed Collector, and that then he (witness) would be released from any embarrassment in reply to a question from Mr. McMahon, as to what Anderson's appointment was, witness made except as recommended by Packwell. Packwell had certainly defended Packard and Sherman's position to witness. He had also received a letter from Packwell written to Anderson and the original list of April 17th appointments. He did not recollect being asked to look them over and see whether any of them were objectionable to him, or whether the desired assistance. He had been told that the list of the democrats had been in the New York office, since December previous, and also in the hands of Senator Conkling, but knew nothing certain about it.

The hearing before the Potter Committee was resumed on the 14th.

Ex-Congressman Darrell testified that in the spring of 1877, Anderson had told him that his protest in regard to intimidation in the parish was correct. He stated that Anderson had later told him that he had seen Matthews and Sherman, and had left with the impression that his letter would be placed in regard to intimidation in the parish. Anderson also told him that he intended to send a letter to Matthews, which he wished, Anderson had told him that he intended to send a letter to Matthews, which he wished, Anderson had told him that he intended to send a letter to Matthews, which he wished, Anderson had GREENBACK MEETING.—A stalwart artist named Armerosus, from Grand Rapids, and a grim visaged blatherskite named Andrews, from Little Traverse, both greenback "orators," held forth at the school house in this village, Saturday afternoon and evening. Lowerauax told what he knew about English history, Mr. Thiers, of France, and that rascally Grant, and in his incoherent way dilated upon the financial question he became befogged, stammered to a stand still, and lost to ask the chairman what he was talking about. Andrews spent a half hour in relating the history of his life, (omitting details) and picturing the wrongs of the laboring classes. The arguments of both were of the stereotyped sort, which everybody has heard, and which seem to us to be entirely antagonistic with national integrity. If this brace of stool-pigeons are the best material the Nationals can send out their chances are slim for success in this region.

HARBOR APPROPRIATION.—The latest announcement in relation to Harbor Appropriations is that President Hayes has seen fit to follow the example set three years ago by his illustrious predecessor, in preventing the prompt expenditure of all appropriations. It is announced that he will allow the expenditure of money only when absolutely necessary to preserve work already done, or to meet the actual necessities of commerce. On both these grounds Charlevoix can demand the immediate expenditure of the $12,000 recently appropriated by Congress. Especially it is necessary to preserve the work already done. The cleaning at the mouth is in a precarious condition, and must have further protection by an extension of piers, or the trade of Pine Lake must suffer very materially. We have confidence that the War Department will so consider it.

LATER.

Since the above was put in type we have received the following:

Detroit, July 5, 1878.

W. A. SMITH, Esq.,

Appropriation will be expended right away. I hope to have a letter by the 25th. Will put in five rubs at Charlevoix this season. Printed specifications will be out in about ten days. Advertisements next week in Chicago and Milwaukee papers.

E. M. MANSFIELD.

Everything usually sold in country stores can be found with us at live and let live prices. FOX, ROSE & BUTTARS.

THE FOURTH.—"Old Probabilities" seems to have forgotten his routine of weather, and instead of the usual rainstorm on Independence Day, the sky was clear from sunrise to sunset. The village bells woke us at sunrise, and from that until evening the atmosphere was fragrant with Fourth of July odors. The crowd was large. The oration at the church by Rev Mr. Blake was pregnant with patriotic sentiment, and would have been applauded to the echo had not the reverend orator requested the audience to dispense with applause. Such a course upon such an occasion was very unusual, and, we think, a mistake. The Charlevoix Cornet Band acquitted themselves with credit, and were complimented from all sources. The Declaration of Independence was read by Hon E. H. Green in a masterly manner. The afternoon was ushered in by the appearance of the cavalcade of wild Indians, headed by Sitting Bull and his chiefs. The display was grotesque and ludicrous. The tight-rope walking by Clifford Paplineu surpassed that of many circus professionals. The usual athletic sports were followed by an exhibition of Mr. Cameron's masterly horse training. The greased pole and Kindred tests of skill were followed by the races, and in the evening the sky was brilliant with fireworks. The celebration at Charlevoix was a success.

If you have but little money to spend and want it to buy a great many goods, call on Fox, Rose & Buttars.

A country girl wrote to her lover: "Now George don't fail to be at the singing school to-night." George replied that "in the lexicon of youth, (Webster's unabridged) there is no such word as fail." The same is true of Smith's estimate made by the new process. Results made with it are always light, sweet and spongy.

If you want to live cheap buy cove oysters of Carpenter & Bartholomew.

The Republican party never did believe the electoral votes of Florida and Louisiana were obtained by Mr. Hayes by fraud or chicanery. It has always maintained, and does now maintain, that if there had been a fair, honest, free election, Mississippi certainly and probably Alabama would have voted as did Louisiana.

The National debt has increased during the month of June just past, instead of decreased, as is usually found to each month's end. Reason, appropriations made by Congress at its recent session, millions of which are to square the deficiencies occurring in the close economy of the Democratic House that preceded this one.

General News Summary

CONGRESS.

IN the Senate, on the 18th, a resolution was passed extending the session until six o'clock p. m. on the 19th. Several amendments to Sundry Civil Appropriation bills were agreed to, one of them being for $25,000 to pay the award of the Halifax Fishery Commission, and the bill as amended was passed. The House non-concurring in the amendments, a Conference Committee was subsequently appointed. A resolution was submitted and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections to allow Senator Matthews to testify before the Potter investigating committee. The House had its time frittered away in matters on the public lands was passed, relating to the diversions of the act allowing settlers who had their crops injured by grasshoppers to leave their homesteads temporarily for the purpose of obtaining assistance. The Senate resolution directing that the [illegible] with China, allowing restricted immigration to this country should be [illegible] and ratify the alteration of the Constitution, was concurred in by the House. A number of amendments to the bill to repeal the Resumption act were non-concurred in—40 to less than the necessary majority in the affirmative—and the bill thus failed of passage. [illegible] extending the time for final adjournment until six p. m. on the 19th, was agreed to. A bill was passed providing for a judicial ascertainment of claims against the United States by Indians not taken into the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims. A bill to suspend the rules and pass the bill to repeal that section of the Resumption act which authorizes the sale of United States bonds for the purpose of resumption, and to provide that United States notes shall be receivable for duties on imports, was received, it will be remembered, by a two-thirds in the affirmative. The Senate amendment to the bill appropriating $2,000 for the expenses of the Presidential Electoral Investigating Committee was concurred in. The Conference Committee was ordered and appointed on the Sundry Civil Appropriation bill. Mr. Hayden announced the death of his late colleague, Mr. Quinn, of New York, and paid a tribute to his memory.

IN the Senate, on the 19th, a new Conference Committee was appointed on the Sundry Civil Appropriation bill, and the session having been extended to three o'clock on the morning of the 20th, a subsequent report was agreed to and the bill was passed. The House bill relating to certain agricultural lands in Nebraska was passed, limiting their free to ten dollars in each case. A resolution was passed directing the Committee to ask the Matthews Investigating Committee to state the reasons of [illegible] at such place or places as they deem most convenient for the purpose of investigation. The bill to establish the Territory of Lincoln was postponed until December 1, 1877. Various resolutions of thanks to Vice-President Wheeler and Hon. Thomas F. Bayard for the able and impartial manner in which they had discharged the duties of the chair during [illegible] were unanimously adopted. Messrs. Burnside, Flemyh and Butler were announced as the committee on the part of the Senate to act under the subject of reorganizing the army, and Messrs. Oglesby, Sanders and McCreery as those under the subject of transferring the Indian Bureau from the Interior to the War Department. The House bill to authorize the payment of certain duties in legal-tender notes from and after Oct. 1, next, was taken up, and its second reading was objected to. The House joint resolution extending the session to three a. m. on the 20th, was agreed to, and a second Conference report on the Sundry Civil Appropriation bill was finally accepted, and the bill was passed. As originally reported the bill appropriated $16,000,000, as it passed the House $20,000,000, as it passed the Senate, $22,025,100 (exclusive of the Halifax award); as it came from the Conference Committee the award was cut down to $12,500,000 (also exclusive of the Halifax award). Bills were passed—that on and after Oct. 1, next, legal-tender notes shall be received at par in payment for custom duties—bill to the Senate bill to create an Auditor of Railroad Accounts; to provide for pay of letter carriers; providing that pensions shall commence from the date of the soldier's discharge, and that no claim agent shall be entitled to any compensation for making out an application for the arrears of pensions. The joint resolution proposing a Constitutional amendment forever prohibiting the payment of any claim for property taken, used, injured or destroyed by United States troops during the War of the Rebellion was then taken up, and the House amendment thereto was rejected, [illegible] Senate bill was passed, providing that persons shall be appointed at large

OUR RADIX LETTER.

New York, July 5, 1878.

Editor Sentinel:

After an unusually long delay, which has proved a genuine boon to the writer, the most newspaper paragraphers, the summer may be said to have fairly set in. The mercury has at one leap gained the top of the tube. All jokes involving Ulsters and fur caps have been suddenly called in, and squibs breathing saltrheum in every line fall copiously from perspiring pens. Now are the days when life is supportable only amid the cool and unrestrained freedom of home, but during which the innate perversity of man and woman as for attracting the magnificent truth—more especially of women, a persistency grown absolutely despotic through unmet indulgence, strongly moves everybody to flee from the one tolerable spot and court discomfort in various time honored forms. Hence the harvest to the public but gentlemen keeper of the summer boarding house, a creature prodigal in promise but scanty in fulfilment, a creature whose character is frequently shown up, but who never fails to find eager victims among the incurably credulous. Hence, too, the hot, crowded and uniformly disappointing excursion by sea or land, which is packed to self-action day after day throughout the season, and that, too, by people who have repeatedly been caught in the same silly trap and vowed as often never to offend again. Hence, too, the terrible hot unavoidable church picnic, that modernized relic of the Inquisition, through whose subtle torture the average church goer is pitilessly dragged at least once for every revolution of this poor old globe about the central luminary of our solar system.

What there is in religion to unpleasantly necessitate an annual picnic in the face of both reason and experience, is far beyond the comprehension of the mere observer of such phenomena, but horrid fact remains, and, instead, I believe that the unformulated rubric which compels the observance of this cruel rite is as much more binding than any one of the Thirty-nine Articles as the unwritten constitution of England is superior in authority to Parliamentary enactments.

The man who is responsible for the saying that "nothing is certain but death and taxes," must surely have been a godless worldling. Had he been like you or me, gentle reader, a regular attendant at divine worship, he would infallibly have included the church picnic in his brief category of the inevitable. It is as curious as it is sad to observe the action of this inexorable law as the season for its operation approaches. This season is usually the first hot spell, and at these ministers and Sunday school superintendents feel the spell upon them. No matter how mild and kind hearted they may be by nature, then comes into their faces a hard, stern expression as they announce to their flocks, "It is about time to be thinking about our picnic."

All know to their sorrow what this portends, but so sad has the moral courage to rebel, and in due time there comes to them a day of heavy baskets, of crying children of worn wet, and sunburn and swollen joints, at the close of which the one thought which soothes and cheers the aching soul is that of the coming year of respite from the affliction.

Do I speak too tragically upon this mournful theme? Well, it's hardly more than natural. I went through the mill myself day before yesterday.

Another comparatively unknown Croesus has died here this week in the person of William C. Rhinelander, whose property is variously estimated at from ten to fifty millions. Thos. E. Davis is another name which falls among this week's obituaries. He was comparatively a poor man, leaving to his distressed family only a couple of millions. Still more sad is the condition of William Vermilye's heirs, who this week find themselves the possessors of only a paltry sum of $900,000. It remains to be seen whether these three wills will be allowed to be hauled over the coals by the lawyers in the Surrogate's court, every act of their lives raked up, and every personal peculiarity discussed publicly and at length, as in the poor old Commodore's case.

A chance, however slight, of creating some portion of a fat estate from the lands of the legatees, is so strong a temptation to litigation that a good many disappointed expectants fall victims thereto. Hence the celebrated contests like those over the Vanderbilt, Stewart, Singer, Dancer, Rollwagan and other well-known wills, the long duration and importance of which give many people an idea that is but of small use to make a will anyway. Figures show, however that even in New York where such strife is most common, only one will in twenty is contested, and not one in two hundred is overthrown. Of course lies in such cases are limited by statute to five per cent of the amount of the estate. In the Vanderbilt case therefore, where the estimated amount in dispute is $100,000,000, the surrogate can, if he chooses, allow $5,000,000 to the lawyers. This case still drags along without showing any signs of coming to an end, and that of Stewart, after lying quiescent for some months, has burst out afresh.

It is a great thing for Mr. Judson, the soap man, that he has a certain to cause larger than he can possibly get away with, or he would soon cease upon the town, what with the flowing and swindling of which to cause to be a favorite subject. The last pledge, of which he has been stolen victim, cost him $20,000. A woman, of good address applied to him some months ago, saying that she was an expert detective, and would probably be able to recover a good proportion of the funds and things taken from him by the embezzling cashier, Beckwith. So the confiding soap boiler began advancing her money with which to prosecute her work, and as her to continue representations was in deed to keep this up, until he was out the sum mentioned, when, no results having been attained, he had his female Pinkerton arrested on the charge of swindling. In court, the lady freely acknowledged the corn, and said she did it merely "in a spirit of devilry." She has not yet been tried.

THE INVESTIGATION.

THE SENATE COMMITTEE.

The Matthews Senate Committee was in session for two hours and a half on the 31st. When the doors were opened, James E. Anderson was sworn, but being refused counsel, he said that he had no statements to make nor questions to answer. The Committee went into private session for the third time. When the door was again opened, Mr. Anderson was informed that he might submit answer any questions that the committee might see proper to put, and was asked his age and address. Mr. Anderson replied that he had no desire to throw obstacles in the way, but the Senate's business was a large, and was likely to be long before his interests, and he declared that it was for he should not have a lawyer to assist him. He intended to make a statement when he was asked, whether he had ever received papers in this case, and whether he had ever shown them to anybody. Upon these questions Mr. Anderson declined to answer. Senator White then asked him if he had ever received papers in this case, and whether he had ever shown them to anybody. Upon these questions Mr. Anderson declined to answer. Several months afterward Mr. Anderson came before the witness and wanted him to make a statement to the effect that Mr. Anderson had never signed a protest, and had a document written by himself to that effect. Among the things he wished to say, Mr. Burke had offered him several thousand dollars and a position if he would go back on the protest. Witness said the fact he knew about the Sherman letter was on the 6th of January last, when it was mentioned by Marshal Pitkin, in a conversation. He never saw a letter written by Mr. Sherman to anyone about the election of 1876. The witness was shown several letters, which he identified as being in the handwriting of G. A. Weber, and then he was shown the signature of Weber to the Anderson-Weber contract, and was asked whether he believed it to be of the genuine. He replied he did not think it was. But Weber always signed his name in a bad hand; that he had never seen him sign as this paper was signed; that it might be Weber's signature, but it was not his usual signature. He had never seen that Anderson-Weber contract before. He also testified to Mr. Kellogg's desire that Anderson should return to East Feliciana and discharge his duties as Sheriff, and that he had offered him an advance of $50 out of his own funds to pay his expenses. He denied Anderson's statement that R. Jemks and a cousin or a relation of the witness had been to Anderson's residence and told as to the facts of the conspiracy that there should be no election in East Feliciana parish and drove out of town. That part of the statement which mentioned the last visit of the wife going to Gen. Pitkin, Chairman of the Democratic State Committee, was true, but he did not was to get a guarantee for Anderson's protection from violence. He was questioned about the Republican State Committee's having sent Sheriff Pitkin to Feliciana to bring Anderson, and said that it was a mistake. Pitkin had been sent to Feliciana to look for Packard and Wiltz, and to confer with Hunt. Hunt also used Louisiana Sheriffs without authority. He had also used Louisiana Sheriffs without authority. He had called on Secretary Sherman for a guarantee of the Sheriff's safety in Washington. His wife had called on Mrs. Sherman and Mrs. Hubbard Hayes, and together with Hunt had discussed Louisiana affairs with them. He had also called on Secretary Sherman in reference to the Sheriff's visit to Washington in response to a letter from Kellogg, and a request for a letter from Sherman stating any information or desire he might have as to New Orleans matters. Sheriff Pitkin was to be Sherman's confidential and personal agent. In a letter to Sherman, Kellogg had said that Pitkin would look up or had up for him. Witness further says that his wife had told him that Anderson claimed to have a copy of the Sherman letter; he did not know it was true; never corresponded with Sherman in relation to that letter. Witness had been informed by Anderson's counsel that he wanted witness to go back on that affidavit. The original interview with Anderson was shown to the witness, who recognized the body of the letter as in the handwriting of Anderson and under the signature of Anderson as Anderson was a warning not intended to recognize the other signatures of Weber and the witnesses.

The investigation was resumed on the 2d. Before proceeding with the examination of witnesses, Mr. Butler stated that, during the examination of Stanley Matthews he would be absent, since he had seen a statement in the papers that the papers for Matthews did not appear to testify before the adjournment was a fear of being insulted by him (Butler). Mr. Matthews and Dr. Reed each explained the passage-at-arms of the preceding day and withdrew all objectionable remarks.

Capt. Peaks was recalled and further examined by Mr. McMahon, in regard to his relations and to his wife to whom name. The latter came at the instance of Mr. Kellogg, and he made it had paid her expenses. Anderson, it was understood, had certain documents which Kellogg desired to get and Mrs. Jenks was in Washington for that purpose. Witness claimed that the reference in Anderson's letter to him in relation to "that document," etc., he did not understand, and had he made for a description or explanation. Anderson had written him that the document was worth $7,000 that could be had. Documents would pay that sum for it. He had seen related in the newspapers that his wife had the so-called "Sherman letter," but she had told him it was nothing. Witness contradicted the statement that he knew nothing of the so-called Sherman letter until it was mentioned by Pitkin on the 6th of January.

Mrs. Jenks, wife of the preceding, testified that Anderson had written to her from Philadelphia in relation to the document which was called the Sherman letter. She knew nothing of this then, or at which Anderson then designated until last January. She had seen the document, picked it up from a table and kept it in her pocket-book for two and a half minutes, when she gave it to Weber. Witness then gave the contents of the letter she handed to Weber, repeating word for word one sentence of Sherman letter. She had never seen the document since she handed

THE A B C OF FINANCE

The Money and Labor Questions Familiarly Explained.

Prof. Newcomb in Harper.

ONE DOLLAR.

The first idea to which I allude is, that if anything is called a dollar by act of Congress, if every one passes and accepts it as a dollar, it must therefore have a definite and fixed value, and be for all practical purposes just as good as a gold dollar. You think, perhaps, that a dollar must be worth just one dollar, and neither more nor less, how, then, shall the value be ascertained? Answer that two kinds of dollars can differ from each other in value just as much as two kinds of bread can in size and quality. You know very well, for instance, that during the past 10 years our paper dollar has been worth from 35 to 90 per cent less than the gold dollar. To express the matter fully, I must, perhaps, in a little digression, and therefore ask a closer attention than I will elsewhere

When we say that a paper dollar can have a definite and fixed value, I mean that it cannot be nearer to buy you any food and definite quantity of the necessaries of life. Money has no value at all except for the things it will buy; you can neither eat it, drink it, nor wear it; for on you even gain interest as it lies in your pocket. What you want of it is to buy things to eat, drink and wear, and the number of these things it will buy, and not the number of dollars, is the measure of its value. You would not give a fig for a pocketful of dollars if you could buy only the half of a fig with them. If this year you had supported your family on five hundred dollars, but next year it should require one thousand dollars, because, on the average, prices had doubled, people would say that the value of everything was twice as great as before. But this would be an incorrect use of language. Really the values of your dollars is only half what it was before. These examples show that this is the only sense in which I now use the word "value," and the only form in which it has definite, practical meaning. Dollars and all other kinds of money are worth what they will buy you to eat and wear; and measuring value by any other standard is like trying to feel a hungry man on an act of Congress.

All the difficulty of this matter arises from the fact that value is something which cannot be seen nor felt. If Congress should enact that all the feet and yard measures of the country should be made of a kind of rubber which would shrink to nine inches in the course of a few months, but which were nevertheless stamped "One foot, by Act of Congress," or "One yard," as the case might be, everybody would see at a glance how ridiculous it would be to require every one to buy and sell by such measures. If a man should boast of having grown a foot and a half in the course of a year, because last year he measured only five feet, while with the new India rubber measures he was now six feet and a half by Act of Congress, his neighbors would laugh at him. The fact that everybody might call the new rubber measures six feet and eight buy and sell by them, would not, in the view of any sensible man, make them as long as the old foot rules.

The reason that these india rubber measures would look so much more ridiculous than similar dollars is simply that their deficiency is longer; it stares to the eye, whereas the depreciation of the dollar is not obvious. In reality, calling a string one foot and legislating it to such is more to make it the equivalent of a good dollar, or of anything else in value, than calling it a foot long, no matter what its real length may be. But we cannot see or feel the depreciation of the dollar as we would see the shortening of the foot measure. We become aware of it only by the general rise of prices, and the general increase in the cost of living. This rise of prices, however, proves the depreciation in the same way that the little man measuring six feet six in his stockings would prove that the foot-rule with which he was measured was too short.

If, now, the reader will hereafter remember that "dollar" is only a word, not a thing; that calling a thing a dollar does not change its nature, and does not make it worth twenty three grains of gold, any more than calling a piece of paper a house, and leasing it declared and stamped a house by act of Congress, would make it daw a carriage—if, I say, he will permanently remember this, he will have taken the first great step to self emancipation in the financial questions.

It is no wonder they were mistaken for it makes flower expand like a Greenbacker.

ACROSS THE PENINSULA.—On Thursday last we enjoyed the pleasure of a trip on foot across the Peninsula from Lalone's Bay, on South Arm, to Advance, on Pine Lake. In no part of Charlevoix County can be found better results of labor and skill than are found along this road We passed the farms of John Vaughan and Daniel Maville, with about every acre of their clearings groaning under abundant crops. Further along we came upon the clearings of Rule and Charles Chaddock, every spot upon which speaks loudly in praise of the energy and skill of their owners. The Chaddocks have each about fifty acres clearing, and all bearing luxurious crops. The farms of John Kinney, Oliver Hart and Delos Pratt were passed further on, and looked well. A. B. Steele and Fowler Steele are upon farms where twelve years of labor have left unmistakable marks. We passed a well-cleared farm, surrounded by a neat board fence, which we were told belonged to A. E. Hayes, of Advance. At Advance we called upon Newton & Tyler, A. E. Hayes, and our old friend Harvey Porter. Our journey across the peninsula had the effect of fixing in our mind firmer than ever the opinion that, as Grand Traverse is truly the garden of Michigan, so Charlevoix County is the garden of Grand Traverse. We saw grain and grass that stood as high as our head, while bending under its burden of ripening seed. We saw school houses and well improved roads—in short all the essential elements of a good farming locality.

CANADIAN PRESS ASSOCIATION EXCURSION.—The propeller Empire State called here Friday evening on her way to Chicago. This trip of the Empire State was the occasion of an excursion of the Canadian Press Association to Chicago, and owing at Charlevoix, the editors first of all paid their compliments to the SENTINEL office. We were out, but one of the typo-editors of the Association put the following greeting in type and left it upon the case:

Canada to Charlevoix, greeting

May your boast little town continue to prosper, and the Sentinel grow just as years increase—long may it guard the public weal.

Forever may the Eagle soar aloft, in peace and harmony fraternizing with the Lion, and God save the Queen!

To every word of which we add a hearty "So mote it be!" The party was made up of the following ladies and gentlemen, as put in type also by one of the editors:

Canadian Press Association and Ladies.

—Names of the parties—Jas. Innes and wife, of the "Mercury," Guelph; W. R. Climie, and wife, "Spectesman," Bowmanville; J. H. Teague and wife, "Times," Port Hope; E. Jackson, wife and daughter, "Era," Newmarket; Jas. Shannon, "News," Kingston; H. Hough, "World," Cobourg; W. Graham and wife, "Gazette," Barkhill, and others.

Before the Empire State took to her lines to depart we learned of the presence of the Association, and hastened to pay our editorial compliments. We found a number of gentlemen who had thrown off the restraint of the sanctum, and were out to enjoy themselves as only editors can upon such an occasion. Their cravings while upon the lake are spoken in the discussion of editorial topics. Fun and business are ingeniously intermingled by the quill-drivers, making the excursion the very perfection of enjoyment. Accommodations for one hundred were secured on the steamer, but the Orange troubles in Canada prevented many from participating. As the steamer backed out from the pier the editors gave three lusty cheers for the SENTINEL, and the last sound we heard from our Canadian fellows was their voices united in the notes of "Auld Lang Syne." Long life to the Canadian Press Association."

A fine stock of new clothing to arrive on Thursday at Fox, Rose & Butters.

THE two orators who lately favored Charlevoix people with their views on finance and other things, undertook to make us believe that value has been destroyed by burning up greenbacks after redemption. What foolishness! And they had also somewhat to say about history—French history especially—in support of their theories. In doing this they should be careful to quote unwritten history, for people here can read and understand for themselves. The fact is that the French financial history which they quote proves exactly the opposite of what they claim it proves. Let Americs avoid results like those which followed the Assignat. The nation should meet its obligations as individuals should, in money worth just as much as when the obligations were assumed. For that reason a paper currency interchangeable at all times with coin is the best, because it fluctuates the least. The debtor then knows that when his debt is due it will cost him no more to pay it, and the creditor rests satisfied that when he receives his pay it will be worth just the same as the money he gave. The volume of money is of minor consequence. The stability of its value or purchasing power is the chief thing to be considered. The greenback orators and journals would have us believe that this "fiat money" will relieve us of all existing distresses If this be true why not go farther and give every citizen a wheel barrow load of it? It costs nothing but the printing. But we think Charlevoix county will put herself upon record for honest money.

OUR RADIN LETTER.

New York, July 12, 1878.

EDITOR SENTINEL:

Since my last letter the American eagle has for the 103d time flapped those tireless wings of his and given Ohio all pervading screech over the doings of 1776. Some one has suggested—and its not such a bad suggestion, either—that 100 years is about long enough for a grown up nation to crow holstcrously over its getting out of leading strings. It is a fair question, at least, whether it is entirely dignified for a country which has attained an unquestioned place among the great powers of the world to keep on year after year yelling, ouuging and throwing up its hat, as crazy with loyish enthusiasm as when it was eighty or ninety years younger, and all because we are not somebody else's colony. I don't want to be thought a reefer at a proper and established order of things, and I don't want to be put out of the synagogue for want of patriotism; but I must say that our present Fourth of July hullabaloo reminds me more and more of the performance of some old gentleman who should each spell a day each year to standing on his head, shooting off a finger or so, and getting blind drunk, to commemorate his having been fished out of the river when a youngster, or to celebrate the day when he got his first pair of boots

But, happily for the fire cracker men and the riding generation, I am in a hopeless minority on this question, and Thursday was devoted to the usual noisy demonstrations; not so noisy as usual in the city proper however, for the authorities very sensibly refused this year to suspend the ordinance against the various preparations of gunpower. There were, of course, numerous violations of the ordinance, but no the whole the city was more quiet than it previous years. But outside the jurisdiction of our worthy Aldermen the din was undiminished, and the suburbs were largely resorted to by those whose patriotic frenzy refused to be curbed by the rules of the municipality.

The terrific weather of the past week drove hundreds of thousands to the ocean's edge, and Coney Island, Manhattan Beach, Rockaway and the other favorite resorts were crowded with pleasure seekers, who reveled in the bit of cool air there vouchsafed them. There seemed to be considerable enjoyment of the day despite the heat, and the reported casualties were unusually few in number.

The afternoon was doubly enlivened by a cooling rain and the bulletin from London which told how nobly the American oarsmen were working to sustain the national reputation for muscle and skill. The wonderful Michigander with the jaw breaking name, were the subject of many admiring encomiums from lovers of the sport. The dispatches of the next day, however, were even more welcome to New Yorkers, as they chronicled the victory of our Columbia College boys over the Hertford crew. American rowing will be regarded with increased respect in England as the result of this regatta.

Bulletins from Paris give us numerous additional descriptions of the prominent displays made by American manufacturers, and it is curious to note how evidently the reports carried back to Europe by visitors to our Centennial, where practically for the first time the world took established cognizance of the extent of American ingenuity and skill, have stimulated European curiosity to examine American wares. Correspondents write that the leading exhibits from the U. S. are constantly surrounded by eager crowds who, as a rule, take no pains to conceal their admiration and surprise. France for instance, is the home of the harmonium or reed organ manufacture, and the Parisois have supposed themselves to lead the world in this industry, but they are now forced to admit that the American Organs, as represented by the magnificent collection of instruments from the factory of Estey & Co., which are there shown are superior in variety, tone and noticeably in richness of appearance, to anything their home factories can produce. The Estey establishment has for years had a very heavy foreign business to which the impression they are now making upon the cosmopolitan throng that daily surges through the Champs de Mars will give a new and considerable impetus.

The hot weather having closed most of the theatres, except the half dozen large ones where the public wears its hat, drinks beer and watches the performance in constant dread of a raid by the police that large fraction of New York, which may be called its "amusement population," has to look elsewhere for entertainment. And so there comes along just in the nick of time a wonderful marksman who draws crowds to watch him perform impossibilities with powder and lead. The name of this new wonder is Carver—Dr Carver of San Francisco, though why he is called "Dr" is more than I can tell, unless it is on account of the facility with which he could kill people if he wished to. There is certainly nothing of the M. D. in his appearance. Dressed in ultra-western costume, with fringed shirt and leather bib, his hair flowing down over his shoulders from beneath his big sombrero, a la Buffalo Bill and Texas Jack, (by the latter of which bloodthirsty acrobics he is accompanied) the great rifleman looks much more like the conventional dime novel hero than like the peaceful professor of healing that his title would indicate.

On the fourth Carver gave a grand exhibition of his powers at the Brooklyn driving park. I am almost afraid to submit my general reputation for truth and veracity to the strain of telling what he did, but I must risk instancing a few of his feats. His sole weapon is a repeating rifle which shoots twenty shots without reloading. He commences by shooting glass balls thrown into the air some 60 feet away. Of these he broke 100 in about three minutes. Then Texas Jack began throwing twelve dollars for targets, and these were unerringly bored by the doctor's bullets. One of the coins thrown was Mexican dollar, and as it rose into the air some one called out to him to cut out the liberty cap which adorns its face. No sooner said than done; for when the silver was picked up a moment later the cap was found to have been cut out as though with a chisel. For an hour all sorts of little articles were sent upward and nine tenths of them knocked to flinders by the magical marksman.

Nothing like this shooting has ever before been seen. Capt. Bogardus is great with his shot gun, but Carver duplicates all his performances, and more too, with "the weapon of the plains."

PERSONAL AND LITERARY.

—Mr. Ralph Waldo Emerson was seventy-five years old, on the 25th of May.

—Edison was married in 1878 to Miss Mary Stilwell, of Newark, N.J. They have two children—a little boy four years old and a little girl aged two—nicknamed "Dot" and "Dash," after the characters in the Morse alphabet.

—The widow of Hahnemann, the founder of homeopathy, died recently at the age of seventy-eight years at the house in the Rue du Faubourg St. Honoré, Paris, which had for a long time been her residence.

—Mrs. Hayes has sent a portrait of herself to the Philadelphia Kindergarten, which she visited recently, with this inscription: "Any I ask, through you, the privilege of saying good morning to our little friends of the Kindergarten? Lucy W. Hayes."

—Mr. Moody the other day praised a fine farm near New Haven, whereupon one of the Evangelist's friends and admirers, a Connecticut gentleman named Trowbridge, offered to buy it for him if he would live there. Mr. Moody declined the offer.

—Jessie Benton Fremont is said to be as attractive a woman in old age as she was in youth, and as her prime. Her abundant hair is white as snow, her complexion is fresh, her features are animated, and her hand is sought by sculptors as a model.

—Of Livy we have only thirty-five out of 140 books. Thirty out of thirty-five books of Diodorus have been lost in Sicily. Cicero's greatest work was lost. Varro wrote the lives of 700 illustrious Romans; Atticus composed another on the names of great men among the Romans. These works were enriched with portraits, and have disappeared.

—Another "learned blacksmith" has arisen. This one's name is Thomas W. Bowditch, and he is employed in an ax shop at Johnsonville, Rensselaer County, N.Y. He has written many essays upon the various agricultural implements, combs, bells and other articles in common daily use, tracing their history from their origin to the present time. His writings are said to have attracted much attention from literary people, especially those who delight in antiquities.

—The great value of the estate of the late Mark Hopkins, of California, has created embarrassing. His wife, in her petition for letters of administration, places the value of the estate at $10,000,000. Two landsmen were required by law, who must qualify in twice the value of the estate, or $20,000,000 each. Leland Stanford and Charles Crocker testified that, in their opinion, outside of railroad interests, the value of the estate was $5,000,000. The difficulty of requiring so enormous a bonds was obviated by depositing in the Bank of California all the railroad bonds. An administratrix bond was then executed for the remaining property, with Stanford and Crocker as sureties, each qualifying in the sum of $10,000,000.

Lessons from Bryant's Life.

It has been truly said that with some men the sooner you cease to talk about them the better they are better for themselves and the world. But the life and career of William Cullen Bryant, just closed, was that of that order. His character will bear inspection, and his virtues are eminently worthy of commemoration. We wish only to call attention to three points which, among many others, are legitimately dedicible.

And first, Bryant's life bears unqualified testimony to the practical value of hygienic rules in living. It was but a short time ago that the then venerable octogenarian gave an account of his personal habits at the request of a friend, and all who read that account must have been forcibly impressed with their regularity and simplicity. Although a full, stout, heavy man, and engaged for the greater part of his time in steady brain-labor, yet his diet was simple almost to abstemiousness, and his physical exercise varied and generous. However it may have been in his youth, in middle years his later days were marked by a most rigid and careful attention to what he considered to be the laws of health. While it does not follow by any means that because Bryant exercised with dumb-bells an hour and then bathed before breakfast, therefore every other man should do the same or expect to die prematurely, yet his temperance, his moderation, his care for his physical welfare, and his regular, simple habits, are at least worthy of notice and consideration by all who hope for longevity, good health, and full, physical vigor.

Again, Bryant's life does not favor the idea that there is any innate incompatibility between the possession of true poetic taste and what is called practical talent or good, sound, common sense in the affairs of every-day life. The notion is short sighted, happily, that because one is a poet and a man of letters or of strong literary proclivities, therefore he must be a little wild and visionary in ideas and fancies, must dress oddly, rave once in a while, sit up nights, and possess a total unfitness for anything like practical, matter-of-fact business details. Bryant, as a man of sterling common sense, as a good financial financier and business manager, as an editor and statesman, at least in thought, will be remembered just as long and favorably as Bryant, the author of "Thanatopsis," and the translator of Homer's "Iliad." It has been held by some that the cast of mind necessary to the production of literature is intrinsically disqualified for active business pursuits; that because Coleridge and Wordsworth together did not have practical ability enough to get a collar off the neck of a horse, but had to be told by a servant, and because Lyron, Shelley, Goldsmith and some others were eminently idealistic and antimundane in mental temperament, therefore all literary men must necessarily be the same. But the career of Sir Walter Scott, Fitz-Greene Halleck, Bryant and a score of others equally sensible and business-like in their views upon practical matters, show that such a rule of judgment would have as many brilliant exceptions as regular examples. It is true that Bryant's muse was not at all of the fanciful order, but more sedate and clerical than gay, dashing and lively, more given to solemn or weighty themes than light and sparkling topics. More endued with grandeur and sublime pathos than crackling and pleasant sweet wit or satire, yet it will belong before the English language contains a better specimen of blank verse than "Thanatopsis" or the "Hymn to Nature." In fine, Bryant will take his place in the literary Pantheon by the side of Thomson and Cowper as one of the few great and genuine poets of Nature. His love for natural scenery and objects, particularly in their grave and quiet aspects, and his sympathy with the majestic solitude of deep forests, was most intense and subtle, and yet, most profound and winning.

Lastly, Bryant's life is hardly corroborative of the notion sometimes entertained that precocity in intellectual development is something desirable. In one sense it can scarcely be called complimentary or creditable for a man to live to the age of eighty-four years and then say, "Try that again, old fellow, but you don't do it right; here's the way"—and off he went. They are very fearless. One flew into the room and I caught it on the window pane. In five minutes or less, holding it by the fin, it was eating rice from my open hand. But the wild bird dies in confinement; and even of the young, taken from their nests, five-out of six are lost in rising. It is pitiful to see the mother-bird come to the cage to feed them, taken in this way; and a popular naturalist asserts that the mother-bird poisons her young, captured and caged, if you let her at them. Poor thing! I suppose the worst to be said of her is that, in her over-anxiety, she over-feeds them.—Florida Cor. Cincinnati Commercial.

Instinct in Birds.

No subject connected with the history of birds furnishes more interesting material for study than that of instinct. Young birds of different species show that they have very different degrees of instinctive knowledge. Some are able to take the entire care of themselves and do not need a mother to watch over them; others, on the contrary, are perfectly helpless, and need teaching before they can do anything for themselves, except breathe and swallow what is put into their mouths. The young chickens, a short time after it leaves the egg, known how to take care of itself nearly as well as does the year-old bird. It can run after it mother, use its eyes, pick up food and answer the call of its kind; and it does all this without instruction. How different it is in all these respects from the young barn-swallow! This is blind, and unable to run, or even to stand, knowing only enough to open its mouth when it hears the old bird return to the nest, and to swallow the food placed in its open bill. Far from knowing by instinct how to use its wings, as the young chick does its legs, it does not learn this until it is well grown, and has had several lessons in flying; and even then it flies badly, and improves only after long practice. After it has learned to fly, it is still very helpless and baby-like, and very different from the active, bright-eyed, independent little chick of the barn-yard—and, indeed, the young of all the Insores, or scratching birds, such as the hen, the quail, the partridge, the pheasant and the turkey.

The scratching birds are not the only ones which can take care of themselves at an early age. This is true of the running birds, such as the ostrich; and the same is the case with many of the wading birds, such as the wild-duck, and among the swimming birds, there are several kinds that take full care of themselves soon after leaving the shell.

Far from standing in any need of instruction, young ducks take to the water by instinct, even when they have been brought up by a hen, and they know that they are perfectly safe upon it, although the axioms hen tries in every way to restrain them and to call them back.

There are many ways in which some of our young birds show their really wonderful instincts; but there is nothing more curious in this respect than the habits of the little chickens, which most of us have opportunities of noticing—if we choose to take the trouble. Those little creatures, almost as soon as they are born, understand what their mother "chuck" to them; and even when that they must hide when a hawk is about; they often scratch the ground for food before they see their mother or any other chicken do so; they are careful not to catch bees instead of flies; and they show their early smartness in many ways which are well worth watching.

But, sometimes, a brood of these youngsters find something that puzzles them, as when they meet with a hard-shelled beetle, who looks too big to eat and yet too small for a playmate.—Prof. W. K. Brooks, in St. Nicholas for July.

A MAN must necessarily keep his word when no one will take it.

The Mocking-Bird.

During the hot spell I remove my writing materials to the front porch overlooking the lake, and a bright view of shining water, broken by islands of oak, hickory, magnolia and the far line of crankling coast, with tree-tanks visible in the clear air, two miles away. Try to distinguish such objects across the Clio, at Cincinnati, against a dark mass of foliage, not a light background. There are mocking-birds nested in the orange-trees all about me, who keep up a constant medley of song. One fellow, especially, likes to perch on the castle a toumost peak and sing his very heart out. My appearance on the porch this morning was a signal for a rauturous shout among them, for these birds learn to know you like their voices, as well as any prima donna at Speringer Hall. One voice distinguished, particularly, by the rapidity with which its trouluhas ran from one to another; wren, finch, linnet, chirk, partridge, were all run together in a marvelous phantasy of notes. As the hearing of one ear is slightly affected, I was also loss to get his position, and stepped from the porch to see if he was on his favorite perch on the peaks. As I did so I saw his graceful gray coat and white lining glistening on a limb in front of me, and the gay yellow saw that I noticed him he went mad with vanity and conceit. In the manner of his cheerful cave we had his lungs just above my head, executing a variety of fantastic trills, and fluttering and throwing his body about in a state of high excitement. A fellow likes to be appreciated, and know it, in this world. I whistled back and he stopped, cocked his head aside, as if to say: "Try that again, old fellow, but you don't do it right; here's the way"—and off he went. They are very fearless. One flew into the room and I caught it on the window pane. In five minutes or less, holding it by the fin, it was eating rice from my open hand. Another Wonderful Cave in Kentucky.

Another wonderful cave has recently been discovered, near Glasgow Junction, Ky. It has already been explored for a distance of twenty-three miles in one direction, called the long line, and sixteen miles in another direction, called the short route. The avenues are very wide; a span of horses can easily be driven through for a distance of seven miles. Three rivers, wide and very deep, are encountered on the long route, and the largest of these is over fourteen miles, until the passages become too narrow to admit a boat. This forms the third or river route, which has to be explored in a boat.

The cave is wonderful beyond description, and far surpasses in grandeur the Mammoth or any cave ever before discovered. Several natural bridges remains have been discovered in one of the large rooms. They were reposing in stone coffins, rudely constructed, and, from appearances, may have been in this cave for centuries. They present every appearance of the Egyptian mummies.

Great excitement prevails over this very important discovery. Mr. Edwin Mortimore, of Chestnut street, Louisville, Ky., purchased three of the mummies and has them now in his possession. Maj. George M. Proctor, of Glasgow Junction, Ky., purchased the remainder of the mummies from the owner of the cave, Thomas Kelley. The latter is, or rather was, a few days ago, a very poor man, struggling to make a payment on a farm of twenty-four acres, upon which, by mere accident, the entrance to this wonderful cave was discovered. He obtained about $400 for the mummies, and is now offered $10,000 cash for five of them.

The entrance to the cave is within the town limits, and is only about two minutes walk from the depot. The surface of the ground in the cave has great elevations and depressions, with everything to indicate that there was volcanic eruptions or violent upheavals of the earth at some period.

The newly-discovered cave has been named the Grand Crystal Cave, and is already in its infancy implies. Ladders and bridges are being constructed, and Mr. J. B. Puckett, a capitalist of the town, announces his intention of having a steamboat constructed expressly for the purpose of navigating its wonderful rivers.—Dispatch to the Cincinnati Commercial.

Terrible Result of an Insect's Bite.

Daniel Welmer, a boy, sixteen years of age, met a strange death yesterday. A wound no larger than a pin-point did the mischief and entailed upon him agony most intense, preliminary to the final result. On Sunday last he was one of a crowd who sought comfort at Union Park, and like many others he lay upon the grass until quite a late hour at night. He felt no fatal result, but went to his home, No. 816 Allen avenue, and slept soundly till morning. He worked all day Monday, and toward evening began to experience a sharp pain on the right side of his face, near the right eye. A close examination revealed a very small inflamed spot under the eye, and in a few hours the inflammation extended downward to the neck, causing great swelling. He suffered much that night, and by morning was terribly disfigured. Becoming alarmed, he visited Dr. Bussman, who at once discovered that the case was a serious one of poisoning by the sting of some insect. He called Dr. T. E. Holland, and, after a consultation, they used every effort to reduce the inflammation and correct the state of the blood, although satisfied that the boy could not be saved. The poison gradually crept through his system till it rendered him a frightful object, his head being four times its natural size, and blood and pus issuing from mouth, nose and ears. At four o'clock on Friday afternoon he died. Of course, it was impossible to determine what kind of an insect stung him, but it seems probable that he received the sting at the park.—St. Louis Republican.

A Remarkable Lion Story.

These superb animals have never formed part of any menagerie, and have retained all their terrible savageness. It is a hunter, and not a trainer, who accompanies them. Mocomo, large, powerful negro of Central Africa, made himself master of these beautiful animals in the following manner: He had been informed of the almost nightly presence of a lion in his neighborhood. He lost no time in arming himself with a long rifle, a hatchet, a dagger and a gun after him, arrived at the appointed place. At the usual hour the majestic monarch of the forest was at its full, and the stranger who saw one another as in broad day. The lion gave utterance to a deep, significant growl, looked from the man to his prey and flourished his great tail. Macomo remained perfectly quiet for an instant, then suddenly plunging his cutlass into them, he raised him in his vigorous arms and threw him at the lion's feet. The wild beast made a bound, sprang upon the bleeding body, devouring it for a moment as it eat down a mouse, and then giving expression to stifled growls of joy, he drank the blood and crushed the bones. And Macomo—what was he doing all this time? Seated quietly a few steps from his guest, he opened a little sack from which he took a bit of meat and dry figs and began his own frugal repast. When his hunger began to be satisfied, the lion raised his head and looked at his host with eyes met. These of the lion were filled with surprise. Those of the man were calm and smiling. The lion returned to his supper. When he was completely satisfied he rose. Macomo did likewise. The lion made three or four steps toward Macomo, who remained motionless, and looking once more at his ox, which was but partially devoured, his eyes seemed to say: "This belongs to me." Macomo bowed. A last glance, friendly this time, and the lion quietly went his way, leaving Macomo master of his prey and his life. The following evening, at the same hour, the African returned to the place of meeting, where the half-devoured carcass still lay, and shortly afterward the lion made his appearance, but not alone this time As the hunter had foreseen, he came accompanied by family and friends. They were four in number—two lions, a lioness and lion's whelps. The repast was served, but this time the previous evening. In the open air. Macomo had built an arbor, covered with vines, bananas and palm leaves, and into this pretty dining-room his guests entered fearlessly. Then crawling noiselessly within reach of a hidden spring Macomo touched it, and his four lions suddenly found themselves imprisoned in a strong iron cage whose bars had been hidden beneath green leaves. Friends were next at hand to aid in removing the four lions upon a cart, and they were about to commence their work when they perceived a new lioness crouched down upon the sand and licking her whelps between the iron bars. When the men raised the cage upon the cart she looked at them beseechingly, and when they all marched on she followed at a short distance with drooping head and tearful eyes. And thus it is that we have five lions instead of four at the Theater Porte Saint Martin—five terrible, ferocious beasts ready to spring at any moment, and although Macomo enters their cage and dominates them to a certain extent, they have not forgotten him for having allowed him a part of their confidence in him, and would ask nothing better than to treat him as Lucca was treated by his seven lions in the last days of the old Hippodrome—simply tear him to pieces.—*Paris Cor. We know daughters whose snuff-libels are concealed in their rooms, where they use the contents constantly, without the knowledge of their parents. We have seen at boarding-schools girls go into hysteries when deprived for a day or two of their snuff, and borrow tobacco from the servants as a substitute until they could obtain their usual stimulant of Scotch or Macaboy; and we are sure that a quarrel with their sisters—beautiful young girls, were it not for the sallow hue tarnishing their complexions—who are at present under medical treatment for derangement of the nervous system and digestive organs, arising from their constant use of snuff.—*Atlanta (Ga.) —A peculiar accident happened the other day in a barn in Brookfield, Mass. A man's vest, hanging on a peg, was blown back and forth against the post by the breeze until matches in the pockets were ignited, and had not some one chanced to be close by with a pail of water, the barn and contents would have been destroyed.

INCIDENTS AND ACCIDENTS.

—While the Rev. Dr. Pentecost was preaching on eternal punishment at New Haven, the other day, he suddenly clasped his hand to his chest, called for some water, and, giving out a hymn, asked the audience to excuse him for a few minutes as he had met with an accident. He had broken a vial of some fiery medicine in his coat pocket by a violent gesture. It seems, burning him painfully and typifying, it may be, some of that anguish which he was trying to depict to the congregation.—N. Y. Evening Post.

—A singular character has just died at Hartford, Conn. He was a man about fifty years of age and of some means, but of clouded intellect, who was every day seen upon the streets, walking with downcast eyes, carefully removing from the sidewalks all stray pieces of orange-peel and banana-skin. It is said that, in early life, his ladylove broke her leg by slipping on a piece of orange-peel, and eventually died from the effects of the accident. This affected his mind and led to his unselfish occupation for the rest of his life —Aunt Mahala Weaver, of White Plains, N. Y., had a thousand-dollar mortgage on her farm, which weighed slightly pressure of a lion in his neighborhood. Air Mousers.

There was a time, and that not very long ago, when accounts of the doings of eyel ones and typhoon fiend like romances in the calm regions of the temperate zone. There was comfort in the thought that these monsters of the air did not exist except in imaginative brains. But of late years they have burst the trouples and seem to be ranging around the globe. The whirling cyclone, the fiery cyclones are becoming too familiar to be pleasant. They come every year, and at each successive visit they storm with increased violence and deadening effect. But the cyclone or typhoon at home is still more terrible than it is when you are abroad among the tropical latitudes. On the 14th of April a very severe typhoon visited Canton, China, and decreased the population by nine or ten thousand, and the houses of the city by about the same number. Its path was about 600 feet in width, and left nothing living or standing in its track. It lifted great granite blocks as if they had been grains of sand, and hurled them down a long distance from the place of starting. It picked up boats and set them down on the hillside. It knocked huge trees as if they had been straws, tossing them up, and, if they mitted stubbornly, breaking them off and using them as cudgels. Thus the typhoon whirled on, lashing and smashing all impediments in its course, and throwing rocks in wild sport at the ruins it was making. Many families were completely buried in the ruins of their houses. In one restaurant there were 100 diners and fifty-two waiters employed, and not one escaped. All were crushed to death in the jaws of the typhoon.—Missouri Republican.

At the season of the year many valuable cows die from what is known as the "clover bloat," and it may be well to know some simple remedy. A physician in Davenport, Iowa, says turpentine will cure nearly every case. One fourth of a gill is an ordinary dose.

—To make black currant jam, gather the currants when thoroughly ripe, and pick from the stalks; bruise slightly, and to each pound of fruit allow three-quarters of a pound of sugar; put sugar and fruit into a porcelain kettle and boil nearly one hour over a slow fire, stirring constantly.

—The following is said by the Rochester Times to be an excellent remedy for burns: One ounce of pulverized borax, one quart of boiling water, half ounce of pulverized alum. Shake up well and bottle. Wrap the burn up in cotton, and keep constantly wet with the solution. Do not remove the linen until the burn is cured.

—Col. R. M. Littler, a successful dairyman, feeds his cows night and morning the year round, and in each feed puts about a teaspoonful of salt. He considers this method of salting cows preferable to the usual one of giving animals salt once or twice a week, and thinks his product is larger by the amount of milk given.

—A novel plan for freeing grain from vermin is recommended in a foreign journal. It advises putting a living cat into the bin, so that it cannot get out. The worms attack the crab and enter the shell. In twenty-four hours a bodily vigorous cat can clear 10 bushels of grain, and no more, but five or ten cows, or two or three cows, and give them scrupulous care by feeding well and sheltering in winter, and will save the increase of their stock for five years; everyone now in debt may have the means to lift his mortgage, or if fortunate in having no such incubus on his estate, he may have the means within reach to place his farm in high condition as a dairy farmer worthy the name during the year. Let our farmers stop this borrowing at 10 to 14 per cent. It sometimes is slow, but always certain death to hope and prosperity The business of the country will not justify more than 4 or 5 per cent. The fact is, continued is borrowing tens of millions at that rate. Let our farmers cease borrowing, and make haste slowly by relying upon the increase of such stock as they can pasture. Do not sell the lambs or calves to the butcher, but keep them till mature animals. Live on the resources of the farm as our grandfathers and grandmothers did. They did not spend their surplus money in coffee, tea and sugar, which did not grow here if they were made wholesome, cheaper and better substitutes. A wholesome bowl of mush and milk is a much better composer to refreshing sleep than a mortgage drawing 10 or 12 per cent. interest. Set your faces like flint against borrowing. If in debt, sell half or three-fourths of your possessions to get out. Shun debt-making as a pestilence. It is the principal source of all the misery farmers are suffering.—Kansas Farmer.

Strength of Greek Soldiers.

The physical superiority of the ante-Alexandrian Greeks to the hardiest and most robust Nations of modern times is perhaps best illustrated by the military statistics of Xenophon. According to the author of the "Anabasis," the commissariat accountants of a Spartan soldier, in what we would call heavy marching order, weighed seventy-five pounds, exclusive of the camp, mining and bridge-building tools, and the rations of bread and dried fruit which were issued in weekly installments and increased the burden of the infantry soldier to 90, 95, or even to full 100 pounds. This load was often carried at the rate of four English miles an hour for twelve hours per diem, day after day; and only in the burning deserts of Southern Syria the Commander of the Grecian auxiliaries thought it prudent to shorten the usual length of a day's march by one-fourth. The gymnastic tests applied by the systasiarchs, or recruiting officer of a picked corps, would appear more preposterous to the unlearned exquisites of a modern "crack regiment." Even tall, well-shaped men of the soundest constitution could not pass the preliminary examination unless they were able to jump their own height vertically and thrice their own length horizontally, and two-thirds of those distances in full armor; pitch a weight equal to one-third of their own to a distance of twenty yards, and throw a javelin with such dexterity that they would not miss a mark of the size of a man's head more than four out of ten times at a distance of fifty yards, beside other tests referring to their experience in the use of the bow and the broad-sword.—Popular Science Monthly.

Borrowing Money in the West.

Borrowing money is one of the most possible sources of misery pervading the Western country. Every farmer, almost, says: "If I had a little capital of money they could and forward it to me, I could place myself on the high road to prosperity and wealth." In nine cases out of ten, this would prove to be a curse instead of a blessing. Look at two to four per cent. for long terms, as a number of our intelligent correspondents state for, not as the case usually exists where the farmer pay-twelve to fourteen per cent. the tenth case must prove as great a failure as the nine.

The most thrifty commercial business cannot survive such a drain as that. No business can pay it, and justly for our farmers to borrow such a ruinous step. While they are found willing to risk such certain ruin, those who loan money have nothing to fear in having what they, with reason, term the market price of capital; and knowing that it is barely within the bounds of possibility for the borrower to pay such rates of interest, they make assurance doubly sure by refusing to loan more than one-third or one-fourth of what is computed to be the cash value of the property. The lender requires a rigorous examination of the borrower which the self-respect of every farmer should revolt at. The value of his land, the value of his personal effects, and of his farm stock, his habits; number of his family; and many similar inquiries as is required to answer under oath before the privilege of paying an annual interest of ten per cent. for three or four years and a bonus of three or four per cent. to the lender, including all costs of drawing and recording papers.

The whole business of borrowing money, as practiced by Western farmers, is sordid and humiliating in practice and ruinous in results. If our farmers will put behind them all temptations to borrow, and set to grow rich, and what they term prosperity, by borrowing from Eastern capitalists, through their agents, who swarm every fall in the region, they will find it will be found to contain worms instead of crab-meat. The entire crab is thrown into the fire and fresh ones put in the grate until the vermin are eradicated.

Foot Rot in Cattle.

Simple foot rot in cattle and sheep is a simple inflammation of the horn secreting structures and adjacent skin, the result of direct irritation. Wearing of the sole to the quick from long journeys on hard roads, resting in or overgrown walls on the sole on soft, boggy pastures; wounds with sharp bodies like nails, glass, etc., the accumulation and drying of clay or mud between the claws; softening of the horn and irritation from standing on hot rocking manure; irritation of the skin around the coronets by lead water, etc., are caused as causes. Symptoms will vary according to the cause, but in all there is lameness, often severe, the sheep getting down on its knees to feed, and an examination of the foot shows the injury. The wound is filled with nails, glass, etc., the heat of the hoof will show the injured one, and a slight paring will detect the wound if not the offending body.

Treatment—in case of a simple superficial rawness between the claws, clean the part and dingle with a fresh cut dipped in a mixture of one part of sulphuric acid and three or four parts of water; or the surface may be smeared with tar and a bandage tied between the claws and around the pastern. In case of the formation of matter beneath the horn the horn must be pared away until we reach the matter, if any, should be removed, the detached horn pared away until we reach that which is still connected with the quick, the surrounding horn should be pared down to a thin edge and the sore covered with tar, with a few drops of sulphuric acid on the surface, the whole being closely bound up with bandage. In exceptional cases the services of the inflammation may demand a poultice, over the surface of which a weak solution of sugar of lead may be poured. One tar dressing is often enough, but the foot should always be examined a few days after, and any hindrance to the healing process removed, foul cases with fungus growths must be treated like similar cases in the horse. Sheep kept in low, soft pastures should have the hoof shortened by a knife or loss-nippers at short intervals, to prevent injury to the sole.

Contagious foot rot presents symptoms resembling those of simple foot rot, but usually begins at the coronet unless in the case of pre-existing sores, and tends to produce fungus growths of the skin around the margin of the hoof and a degeneration of horn in some respects comparable to canker. It is mainly to be recognized by its spread in a flock in a sequence of contact with diseased animals, and without any sufficient cause in the management or in the dampness of the locality. Treatment does not differ materially from that of simple foot rot except that a preference must be given to antiseptics in the selection of caustic dressings. Hydrochloric acid reduced with three its bulk of water; chloride of zinc one drachm, water one pint; carbolic acid butter of antimony, may be cited as examples. Much more important, however, is it to separate the sound from the diseased and from contaminated pastures and buildings, and to thoroughly cleanse and disinfect the latter before allowing again need for the shelter of flocks.—Prof. Law's Medical Advice.

THE VALUE OF PAPER MONEY.

With these two ideas unlearned, we are in a proper state of mind to inquire what gives value to paper money. You know that, practically, far the greater part of the business of the world is carried on by using paper or credit instead of gold. Only an insignificant fraction of mercantile payments are made by actually counting out gold. If one merchant has to pay another a thousand dollars in gold, he simply hands him a check for the amount, which the second merchant, perhaps, passes over to some one else. Here is a piece of paper, of no value whatever in itself, passed from hand to hand just as if its value were a thousand gold dollars. How is this? Can we pay with correctness that the check has any real value? The answer is clear and simple. The value does not reside in the check itself, but in the 23, 200 grains (say three pounds avoirdupois) of gold to which the holder of the check is entitled, and which he knows the bank is able and ready to pay him. That is all. If the bank is not bound to pay the check, no matter how many dollars may be marked on it, no matter how beautiful the engraving, it is worth nothing. If the check is not payable in gold, but in greenbacks, then it is worth not a thousand dollars in gold, but only in greenbacks. So it is with all the commercial paper money of the world, which circulates in such enormous quantities in place of money. Its sole basis is that responsible men are bound to pay it, and its value depends upon the weight of the gold to which it entitles the holder, no matter whether it is called pounds, francs, or dollars.

Observe carefully that it is not sufficient that the paper "represents" so much gold, or that the firm which issues it is very wealthy or powerful. The holder of the paper must have an acknowledged right to the gold, which the bank is not going to dispute. If there is any doubt whether he himself, or any one to whom he may pass the check, will be able to get the gold for it, then the check will be depreciated. If it is certain that no one can ever get the gold for it, its value will be just that of a pretty picture for the children to play with, no matter how strongly it may be declared to represent a thousand dollars.

Now, with a single exception, which we shall consider presently, the value of Government paper money is determined in precisely the same way with that of mercantile paper. In itself it has no value at all. Congress may stamp it one dollar or one hundred dollars; but unless it entitles the owner to claim something, it is a mere piece of paper. If the owner can actually get a gold dollar with it, it is worth a gold dollar; other wise it will be none or less depreciated in value, according to the hope of future payment, which the holders may entertain. Of course, Congress can make everyone call it a dollar and receive it under that name, but we have seen in the other lesson that this does not give it real value—that is, purchasing power. If any one is compelled to take it, he simply puts up the price of everything he has to sell in proportion to the depreciation of the paper, so that the result is the same as if the paper passed at a discount.

We must now point out a fallacy by which the supporters of the irredeemable paper money often try to get round these considerations. It is said that the greenbacks, or their proposed paper dollars, are to be issued "on the credit of the nation," and therefore must have value in proportion to that credit, even if the nation does not redeem them.

The word "credit" is here used in some peculiar sense (which no one can fully explain) wholly different from its commercial sense. In the world of business, "credit" includes the ability and the obligation to pay all demands as easily as they become due. A man or a firm that cannot do this has no credit, however excellent it may be in other respects. Suppose you should be traveling in a distant city, and, going to the cashier of your hotel for change, he has but a ten dollar bill on the banking firm of Spread, Brothers & Co.

"Are you sure this bill is good?" you inquire.

"Good as gold, sir. The firm of Spread, Brothers & Co. is the greatest in this State, possessed of unbounded wealth, and its operations extend over the whole globe."

"Then," you reply, "I suppose if I take this bill to their counter, they will pay it?"

"Pay it! Why, no, sir. You would be hooted by the small boys in the street, and laughed at by Spread's clerks. The credit of the firm is so excellent, and all its debts so well secured by real estate and bonds worth millions of dollars, that both the firm and the community concluded, ten or twelve years ago, that there was not the slightest need of their redeeming their bills, and they are never going to do it."

"I don't understand that kind of credit. In my State credit pays for something which the party issuing is bound to pay when required; and if he does not pay he has no credit, no matter how rich he is."

"Of course two penny firms must pay. But we explain that a firm as great, powerful and wealthy as that of Mr. Spread need not pay."

"Well, sir," you would reply, "I don't see what difference it makes to me how wealthy Spread's firm is, or how well their paper is secured, if I can't get any of their wealth in exchange for my bill. I always thought the advantage of having the paper of a wealthy firm was that it was surer to be paid; but if the richer the firm, the less the need of paying, I would rather have the bill of some smaller house."

"Ah, you know nothing about finance, I see, and I'll get you some foreign money rather than argue further with you."

If a hotel cashier should talk in this way to you, you would be a little puzzled to say whether he was joking or in earnest. And yet great statesmen do argue in just that way about our greenbacks. There are bills to the amount of $400,000,000 afloat, reading, "The United States will pay the bearer ——— dollars." Yet if you should take one of these bills to the Government's counter, asking that this promise be redeemed, the clerks would laugh at you. A year or two since some one did this very thing, and the newspapers speculated on the man's sanity, while a Treasury official thought he was only trying to make himself notorious. If a politician tries to justify permanent non-payment, he will talk about the credit and wealth of the nation exactly as the hotel clerk talked about Spread, Brothers & Co. Now it will be a very profitable mental exercise if the reader will ask himself what is meant by the promise, "The United States will pay the bearer ——— dollars;" and if, also, for each theory of the subject he may form, he will consider how it will look for a banking firm to put that same interpretation on its promises.

AT Little Traverse last week we called upon our editorial brethren of the Tribune and Independent. Little Traverse is to be congratulated. They have two good papers, and two good men to wield the quill and scissors. Bros. Clark and Hampton have our best wishes.

—Who says Charlevoix is not an important marine port? Seven vessels of the steam kind laid at our harbor docks Sunday.

—Pearson and Stark, the U. S. Steamboat Inspectors, were here yesterday.

—The steamer Clara Belle arrives here from Traverse City every Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday evenings, making connections with the Van Raalte from Petoskey the same evenings, and departing for Traverse City on the mornings following her arrival. This steamer, under the command of Capt. Wilbur will be popular on this route.

—The steamer Sutton has, as it were, passed under the magician's wand, and her transformation is complete. She lies thirty inches more beam on deck, than formerly, and her after part has been hooded in, and arranged as a cabin. She is decked over forward, and a pilot house added. She is now indeed a beautiful little steamer. Capt. A. B. Aldrich, of this place, commands her.

KEEP it before the people! That Charlevoix wants a flouring mill. An old settled farming country, contiguous to Charlevoix will this year produce 100,000 bushels or over of grain, which demands means whereby it may be handled to a better public and private advantage. Some practical miller with capital can find a good opening here.

THE WEATHER.—Never within the memory of the oldest inhabitant has "Old Sol" shed such everlastingly hot rays upon the earth as during this region. On the 10th and 17th the mercury reached 102 in the shade, and some report even higher than that. Such excessive heat was of short duration however.

Fresh Butter wanted at Fox, Rose & Buttars.

THE steamer Sutton, of Elk Rapids came down Saturday evening with a party of Elk Rapids ladies and gentlemen among whom was our former fellow-townsman A. R. Dougherty, and his daughter. They spent the Sabbath here and returned yesterday.

Republican County Convention

A Republican County Convention will be held at the Town Hall in the Village of Charlevoix, on the 10th day of August, 1878, at one o'clock p. m., for the purpose of appointing delegates to the State Convention to be held at Traverse on the 22d: also to appoint delegates to the Representative and Congressional Conventions.

ROBERT MILLER,
Chairman County Committee.
Charlevoix, July 24, 1878.

COLFAX AT LITTLE TRAVERSE.—The steamer Gazelle took a party of about thirty Charlevoix people to the Presbyterian Resort at Little Traverse, on the occasion of the address of Hon Schuyler Colfax, at that place, on Wednesday last. Mr. Colfax's an orator, and his subject—"Abraham Lincoln,"—is one which brings out a natural earnestness and pathos of expression which is more than eloquence. The Writuney which Mr. Colfax enjoyed with the lamented Lincoln gives him the possession of a fund of personal recollections, the relation of which graphically illustrate the grand yet gentle character of the martyr-President. The address was one to be remembered for a life time.

Spurgeon says that he once prevented a severe case of hydrophobia by simply getting on a fence and waiting patiently till the mad dog had passed. Many a noble hearted wife could have prevented having weary, sore bleeding if she had only used Fairlie's alteration made by the new process. It is always full weight, uniform in strength and the best in the world.

Persons of unbiased judgment, who have examined the locations thoroughly, pronounce the "Charlevoix Summer Resort" superior in almost location to many celebrated, as apart for the same purpose in Northern Michigan. Its elevated situation, commanding as it does extended view of both Lake Michigan and Pine Lake, and constantly embraced as it is by the cool lake breeze, it captivates all who beholds it. Its contiguity to the beautiful inland steamboat route, upon the "Lake Geneva of America," and its nearness to the famous trout streams of the Northwest, make it the pleasure seekers a place of genuine enjoyment. Its superior attractions are fast being found out and taken advantage of.

THE HARBOR WORK.—The specifications give until June 1879 for the completion of the pier-work, but the substructure of the five cribs will undoubtedly be completed the fall, as will also the brush work at the foot of the piers. The project embraces the following improvements: To re-fill the old north pier with stone; to put in piece an ansom of brush, weighted with stone, along the outer base of the north pier, extending 200 feet, more or less, from the shore; to place a similar apron of brush along the line of shore east from end of present brush-work, on south side of channel for a distance of 250 feet, more or less. The work will take nearly 20,000 cubic feet of timber; 22,633 pounds of iron bolts, and 530 cords of stone. Several bids have gone in from here.

A TRIP UP THE STATE ROAD.—On Friday afternoon we had the pleasure of a ride down the State Road behind Sheriff McLeod's fine team, with our friend J. A. Cameron at the lines. We were pulled at the farm of Alexander Ross. Mr. Ross has been here about seven years, and has made good use of her use of his time. He has twenty acres under crops, and a fine orchard of 20 trees in bearing. Mr. Ross has fine buildings, and everything comfortable around him. We next visited the farm of Mr. J. H. Speidel, a very intelligent German gentleman, who lately purchased 160 acres of land where he is located. He is making good improvements, and will soon have a nice farm. Mr. Jerome Graham is doing well on his place, and his crops look well. Improvements are being made in the improvement of the country along the route is of much of this year.

Death from Excessive Joy.

On Sunday evening Mrs. Judith Dixon, of Silsden, dropped down dead, it is generally thought, from excessive joy at the return of her son, Thomas Dixon, who had been nearly nine years in America.

On hearing of the death of his father, Mr. Abraham Dixon, on Aug. 1, 1877, the son had informed his mother that when he could command his affairs he should return home. The mother had for several years suffered from palpitation of the heart. Mr. Dixon arrived at Silsden station by the evening mail train, and was driven in an omnibus to the foot of the hill where his mother resided. On finding his parent out and telling who he was, a neighbor, Mrs. Steel, went at once to the Bethesda chapel, where a prayer meeting was being held, and where Mrs. Dixon was. She informed her that Thomas had returned, whereupon the mother immediately left the chapel and came home.

She appeared agitated, sat down in a chair, and was seized with illness. A short conversation ensued between mother and son, in which she asked if it "really was her son Thomas," and was told in reply that he was her son. Almost immediately afterward she expired.—Leeds (Eng.) Mercury.

THE Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company was lately charged, in the Circuit Court of Mineral County, W. Va., with being guilty of Sabbath-breaking by running its trains on a Sunday, and on the trial of the case a verdict of guilty was rendered and a fine of $500 was imposed for the offense. Several other cases, involving the same charge, are pending in the same court.

THE time a boy begins to think his mother doesn't know enough to select his clothing for him is a dangerous period in his history.

THE INVESTIGATION.

BOULDS BAKER, the man who sent a lengthy telegram to the President suggesting the appointment of Southern conservatives to Cabinet positions, appeared, on the 1st, and declined to be either sworn or answer any questions propounded to him. The Chairman stated that as the Committee had no power to compel witnesses to testify during the recess of Congress, he would be discharged from further attendance.

Mrs. Jenks testified that A. T. Stewart's brother had recently been appointed to a position in the New Orleans Custom-House. She also stated that Mr. Stewart had paid Mrs. Sherman's rent, and had been very liberal in subscriptions to the Committee. In answer to questions by Mr. Cox, witness stated that at the time of the election Anderson had refused to return to Packard's house because Packard would not allow his wife assistance of protection, and the witness called on Packard, Chairman of the Democratic Committee in New Orleans, and made arrangements satisfactory to Anderson, and he then returned there. He got a guard, also a special guard was sent for him to Port Hudson. Witness then denied that she said, as had been sworn to by other witnesses, that Louisiana matters affected Sec'y Sherman like a ring-bone does to a colt," or that she would "make it hot for Sec'y Sherman." Mrs. Jenks then thanked the Committee for the courtesy shown her and was discharged.

The Committee then went into executive session to consider the refusal of Boulds Baker to testify. It was finally determined to refer the matter to the United States District Attorney for his direction as to the course to be taken. On further meeting that he was guilty of contempt, and could be punished by fine and imprisonment under the provisions of Sec. 102 of the Revised Statutes.

The Committee recalled Thomas E. Anderson, a witness for the Republicans, who he did not see anyone sign the Electoral certificates while in the Governor's office at New Orleans; that Mrs. Jenks was in the room when witness went to Packard's house; that Packard said to witness that if he and Hayes did not get a vote in Louisiana and West Feliciana, he was going to Oregon and Hayes to be President. He said the last was the conversation Stanley by the evening mail train, and was driven in an omnibus to the foot of the hill where his mother resided. On finding his parent out and telling who he was, a neighbor, Mrs. Steel, went at once to the Bethesda chapel, where a prayer meeting was being held, and where Mrs. Dixon was. OUR RADIX LETTER.

EDITOR SENTINEL:

The Metropolitan Elevated Railroad, although in running order and doing a heavy business, finds itself by no means through with its troubles yet. Beside having various suits on its hands, in one of which damages are claimed to the amount of $4,500,000, certain things about its operation are raising such a hue and cry from the Sixth Avenue ites as even a soulless corporation not dare ignore. Outraged citizens complain that sparks from the dummies burn them and their store awnings, that gas, smoke and cinders from the same source blind and choke them, that oil from the running gear drops down ruining their clothes and their dispositions, and worse than all, that the ceaseless rumble and clatter of the trains wears upon their nerves, preventing sleep, and driving them to the verge of suicide. This formidable arraignment is backed up by a vigorous published protest signed by a hundred or two physicians, who state that in their opinion, the road in its present shape is a deleterious nuisance.

Thus beset, the managers of the route are casting about for means of appeasing an angry public. The sparks and cinders they think they can control without much trouble, but how to deaden the noise which is the annoyance most complained of, is a much more difficult problem. To aid in its solution the managers have called into their councils that versatile and extraordinary man, Edison, him of the telephone, phonograph, microphone, aerophone, &c., &c., and he has now been at work for several days with some of his wonderful sound registering machines, trying to find out at what particular points of the train and track the main part of the obnoxious racket is generated. When this is done, says the inventor, it will be comparatively easy to reduce the noise Meanwhile the growlers have become temporarily quiet, their curiosity over Edison's performances overcoming for the moment their sense of annoyance.

New York merits and possesses, too, the reputation for originating more, and more extraordinary journalistic enterprises than any other two cities in America. Some of these I have already referred to in my correspondence; but nothing that has appeared since I commenced to observe metropolitan publishing compares in novelty and originality with "The Advocate," which, within the last two months has run up in circulation to over half a million of copies weekly. From its start, the Advocate has been a genuine sensation. It champions labor reform, greenbacks, The Grange Quakerism, and Free Masonry. It has been laughed at, poohpoohed and abused without stint. Its existence has been ridiculed, and its immediate failure predicted—and yet it goes on undisturbed, rolling up a circulation absolutely unparalleled in this country, and showing every sign of prosperity. Its publishers violate every tradition of journalism by furnishing this large eight page weekly for twenty five cents a year—less than the cost of white paper—and strike heavy blows right and left with absolute fearlessness. Its editorials and news items are condensed to a degree that would almost drive John Russell Young himself to suicide, and everything about its conduct indicates phenomenal nerve and ability.

Miss Kate Claxton, the most popular and beautiful "Orphan" on the New York stage, has leased the "Lyceum Theatre," and is to open about September 1st with a fine Company. Her aim is to introduce the very best of foreign novelties in advance of their appearance at any other theatre in this country.

And speaking of foreign novelties reminds me of a foreign actress who is about coming to this country, and who is now going through the ordinary or rather extraordinary course of puffing which always precedes the advent of a European star. It is astonishing to see what an object of interest this lady has suddenly become to our newspapers. All the details of her life, habits and appearance are being enlarged upon, and as a final stimulant to public curiosity the fact is heralded with many admiration points, that the fair creature will wear in certain plays a dress made by Worth from the same piece of goods from which that distinguished artist recently constructed a costume for the Queen of Spain. In the expressive language of the vulgar, "How is that for high?"

An unusual crime was committed here this week, with an unusual object. A drunken wife, abused by a drunken husband, living in extreme poverty in an East side tenement house, became desperate through trouble and drink, and procuring a can of kerosene, saturated the room in which she lived, set fire to it and left the house in which were her own children, and some twenty other families. Luckily the flames were discovered in time, and sickening sacrifice narrowly escaped. When arrested the miserable woman said her object was, to do something bad enough to get herself sent to prison for ten years, where she hoped to find an asylum from the intolerable life she was leading.

Since it has become a recognized custom for members of different branches of business to have their organizations, such as Boards of Trade, Chambers of Commerce, Bar Associations, etc., the Hotel Proprietors, representing large interests of their own as well as that of public, have had a meeting for the purpose of joint protection.

The practices of dead beats and incompetent of unfaithful employees thereby will be better looked after as well as matters pertaining to the comfort and safety of patrons of the hotels, who are generally the suffering victims. A dead beat or dishonest servant generally does his thieving from a guest whose time, even if the thief is arrested, is too important for him to lose it in delay for purpose of prosecuting in the courts. Thus the criminal escapes. The hotel suffers in reputation, but is powerless to act, for, as the property lost does not belong to the proprietor, he cannot prosecute. By timely warning given from one hotel to the other through the proper channels all have notice, and are thereby on their guard.

A meeting of the managers of these hotels was held last week, therefore, to consider this subject and to organize a Hotel Keepers' Protective Association. Mr. Uriah Welch was elected President. Mr. Welch is the proprietor of the St. Nicholas, a hotel dear to New Yorkers by reason of its being one of the oldest in town and bearing the name of the city's patron saint, and to the traveling public by reason of its being one of the best hotels in the world. On account of this popularity it has always been sought by the elite.

The changes just announced in the New York Custom House, are the subject of comment on all sides. Collector Arthur, who has held his important office for six years, is suddenly and summarily removed, and Naval Officer Cornell's official head falls into the same basket. No cause is assigned by the government as yet for this step. Merritt & Hunt are the successors respectively of the gentlemen named.

A Toledo Examiner.

Yesterday occurred the happy ending of a long and weary waiting on the part of a lady who was once the fairest of the fair daughters of Toledo. Seven years ago she was betrothed, with her parents' consent, to a young man of fine character, but without what is considered the most desirable of possessions next to that, namely, money. Hesitating to take his beloved from her pleasant home to subject her to the trials that poverty entails, he bade her farewell, to go West to seek his fortune. She had letters from him full of hope and cheerful expectation until he reached Omaha, when they suddenly ceased. The days were into weeks, the weeks into months and then into years, but still no word from the absent one to the expectant girl who waited and watched all in vain. His friends gave him up for dead, but she, with woman's persistency, refused to think so and declared her belief that he would some time return to claim his bride. Suitors came and went, the light of her eyes became dim from weeping, the roses faded from her cheeks, and gradually she withdrew from the scenes she had graced with her presence, her very existence was almost forgotten by society.

Two week's since, while sitting alone in her quiet parlor, the bell rang, and in a moment more the door opened and a gentleman walked the room. The bronzed and bearded man had little resemblance to the slender youth to whom she had plighted her troth so many long years before, but the eye of love could not be deceived, and in a moment more she was clasped in the arms of her long lost one. Sad so long watched and waited. His story was soon told. Leaving Omaha with an emigrant train for the Pacific coast, it was attacked by the Indians, and he was taken prisoner and carried away into the far interior. Every effort to escape was futile, and he was passed from one tribe to another, getting farther and farther away from civilization as the months rolled on. At last, by fortunate chance, he managed to deceive his jailers, and, after incredible hardships, reached San Francisco three years from the time he left Omaha. Here he encountered an old acquaintance from Toledo, who in answer to his inquiries about the dear ones there told him that his betrothed was the wife of another. Stunned and heartbroken, he made no attempt to communicate with anyone here, and was not undeceived until a few weeks ago, when on a visit to San Francisco from his island home, he had again received tidings through an old neighbor that sent him homeward as fast as the cars would bear him hither.

The denouement was what might be expected, and this morning the happy pair started for their Western home, amidst the good wishes of their friends, including those of the Blade, will follow them.—Toledo Blade.

Buying Wool in Paris.

Have been buying wool. They sell it here by the pound, like coal. Wool shops always have imitation wood piles painted on their fronts. Shopkeepers in the working quarters seldom put out their names on a sign. It is all "grocery," "wash house," "wood shop," "commerce de vins," "tobacco shop," "beef and bouillon shop," "butter, eggs and cheese," "fruit and potatoes," "fruiterie" and "restaurant," and the restaurant here is about the last place where you can get something substantial to eat. They will give you wine, or coffee and brandy, or beer, as a shop labelled "restaurant," but ask for a beefsteak, and they point next door. However, you can generally find it next door, only in some cases, if it happens to be a soup factory, of which Paris is full, they may not keep coffee. It is the most peculiar and uncertain city to get a meal in I ever visited or imagined could exist, and as for me, I might be "hotel," and therein hotel-beds, and you find no bar, no landlord, no rooms to let in the night, no meals or table at any kind. No sir-ree! All people who hire their rooms by the month and possibly cook in them. We've turned into French restaurants into something quite different from the article as found where it was first manufactured. Now as to wood. A Paris wood-shop beats the Exposition. It is generally kept by a woman, and the woman is generally washing. She keeps a great deal of charcoal with the wood, the woman is generally black, and if the man of the house happens to be about the premises he will be black. Here are also always found a baby playing about the floor, which is blackest. I pause a moment to say here that in France men and their wives pull together better in doing business than in America. Whether it is grocery, wood-shop, photographer, restaurant or tobacco shop, you will always find the woman up and doing, with the husband. She seems to know as much as he does about he. She sits at the desk and takes the cash. If the man be out, she can weigh and measure. She knows all the prices and the contents of every box, bag and jar. If there be a family, they are also all up and doing. My vegetable merchant, four doors below, has a wife, a pretty daughter and a sister. In the morning, when trade is the most lively, the whole family turn out and wait on customers. They haven't far to turn—because the room where they eat, sleep and enjoy all the balm they can suppose the rising sun has carried out of it at a single bound—seems to ovule the shop. They live as well on the sidewalk as indoors. The street is the French common people is a part of the house. As it is with my vegetable dealer, so it is with my grocer.

To return to wood buying. I had no idea how wood was sold in France. I had no French words available in which to ask for wood. I went into the wood-shop and amiably showed three francs. The woman comprehended me. She was washing. I was impressed by the enormous cake of soap she used. In Paris you can buy an enormous cake of soap for seven cents. I use the term "soft" advisedly. It is genuine, old-fashioned soft soap, smelling of lye and manufactured from wood ashes, such as our old Continental grandmothers used to make once a year. I said to the wood-woman, as well I could say in French, "I would have some wood." It's a complimented process, speaking a sentence in the first person, singular number, potential mood, and whatever tense one numerous American grammarians choose to put it in to a foreign French woman. She commenced piling sundry short logs on a pair of scales. At this I sneered up on her. That's all their wood is good for, their coal, by weight! which is the proper way to sell wood. But the logs were too large for my fireplace. I must make known this imperfection. I said, "Trop, grand trop. Oh! well, no big, madame." Then I tried to swell up and look suited out, more clearly to illustrate my meaning. The language of gesticulation is supposed to pass current the world over. At all events, it was in the wood-shop. She smiled. I don't wonder she smiled. I know I must have swelled ridiculously. But she understood me. She seized an ax. Momentarily, I thought she intended to split my head open. For while you are learning and practicing a foreign language you are liable to say all sorts of dreadful things to people when you thought you were saying something else. But the woman with the ax meant to reduce, not my size, but that of the logs. Such an ax! A Yankee woodcutter would make a museum of it. It was miner's pick one end and ax the other. It did not seem good for this kind. But the wood saleswoman was. She was young, healthy, white-capped and red-cheeked, when not temporarily charcoaled. The wood weighing finished, she stood a log by on end. I wondered what she was going to do. She took up the ax, looked around for a hole to dodge out of in case of attack. She divided the log with a blow, and then subdivided the pieces with more. In three minutes she had a good wood-pile, in the requisite size. When I say "head of wood" I mean a cubic foot. A hundred of wood will last a French family a year. The "head" split, the ax appeared from some secret recess. He was there all the while. She harnessed him. She puts sort of saddle on his back, leaving a frame projective at the lower end. On this was put the wood. After which he fastened me without any driving to my lodgings, where this faithful Gallic nonsense beast toiled up six flights of stairs, and piled the wood in a corner. Total expense, seventy cents.—Paris Cor. N. Y. Graphic.

How a San Francisco Lady Routed a Burglar.

On Thursday last a lady residing in California street, near Leavenworth, whose husband is absent from the city, collected by his request $120 for rents. She expended $20 of it during the day, and the remaining $100 she intended putting in the bank the following day. She did not retire until eleven o'clock on Thursday night, and was just dropping off into a sleep when she was suddenly aroused to perfect wakefulness by a slight clatter. She went through a swift and startled mental calculation in a second for it, and concluded that it was caused by the dropping of the key of the front door on the hall floor, and that it must have been pushed out by a letter in effecting an entrance to call her. Now was the time for the average lady to leap from her couch, turn on a few different alarms, turn on a flood of gas, throw up the window and screech, murder, fire and police. This lady was not of the average, and stepping noiselessly from the bed she found her husband's loaded revolver without striking a light, cocked it, and swung open the door. Then a man appeared to make known this imperfection. I said, "Trop, grand trop. Oh! well, no big, madame." Then I tried to swell up and look suited out, more clearly to illustrate my meaning. The language of gesticulation is supposed to pass current the world over. At all events, it was in the wood-shop. She smiled. I don't wonder she smiled. I know I must have swelled ridiculously. But she understood me. She seized an ax. Momentarily, I thought she intended to split my head open. INCIDENTS AND ACCIDENTS.

—A Helena (Mont.) father recently lost $750 in greenbacks, but some days afterward found that his little daughter had used it to make a head-dress for her doll, chipping off the corners to make a good fit.

—In Alburgh, Vt., a horse got frightened, the other day, in the field, ran to the house with a plow dragging at its heels, dashed into the kitchen, through the hall and out of the front door, scattering and breaking things, and creating a general sensation.

—A case of singular attachment has been a kitten and a hen and brood of chickens is reported from Hartford, Conn. The kitten passes most of the day and the entire night in the chicken coop in which the hen is confined and where the chickens are fed. During the day the kitten lies near the entrance of the coop, and occasionally gives the chickens as they pass a playful tap; but at night comes in, curls up by the side of the hen as she covers her brood, and lies there contentedly until morning. The mother hen offers no resistance to its attentions, but rather seems to approve of them.

—At Cleveland, recently, a young lady, named Miss Mary Hayes, lost her eyesight almost immediately. She received enjoying excellent health, but during the night she was awakened by a sensation of pricking in her eyes, and following which she felt a snapping near them as if something was breaking. This lasted only a second or two, but from that time to this she has been stone blind. The best medicals of the city say the case is unprecedented in their knowledge, and are unwilling to venture an opinion as to how it will result. Miss Hayes still enjoys good health, and has no unpleasant feeling except that which comes from her misfortune.

—At Lewiston, Me., the other day, as a father and boy were driving along the river road below the river, he heard a loud scream from the bank of the river, twenty feet distant. On the river-bank he found a large dog furiously attacking a small naked boy. Some men hooing in an adjacent field came to the spot at the same time. Father Wallace attacked the dog, and drove him from the child, when the beast made a spring for another little fellow near by, and killed him. It was with considerable difficulty that the dog was driven away by the efforts of Father Wallace and others who came to the rescue of the wounded and who will acknowledge that she lacks those qualifications? One cannot expect to turn out a good digestible dinner, and read a novel or gossip with a neighbor during the process. You cannot serve two masters; if you attempt it, the bread will burn, the meat will catch, the steak will "shrivel at a fruitless fire," the soup will simmer away. If you are not interested in the business, and don't care a big how it succeeds, so that meals are served and people fed, and you can wash your hands of the whole concern, if you only cook as a make-shift—from hand to mouth, as it were, hoping the Fates will interfere to-morrow and relieve you of a distasteful occupation—your gravy will naturally be thin and lumpy and unseasoned, your bread sour, your cake heavy, your doughnuts will sink fat, your roasts will be overdone, and your husband will wonder why your pastry doesn't taste like his mother's. Cooking cannot be taken up as a lay-play and amusement merely, as we take up croquet, and any excellence be attained. One doesn't become an accomplished cook at the first essay; it requires many a failure, many a partial success, many a blister upon the hands, many a trial of temper. Young people go into the home kitchen and dabble in cookies and flummeries, and think they have mastered the noble art, when, in truth, they are ignorant of its rudiments, and believe that the ability to bungle constitutes Capoletta fare and grand souffle is a recommendation of a good cook; and these are all well in their way, but only finger-work. Indeed, there is no royal road to cookery; it is a plain, much-traveled turnpike, where the simplest need not lose the way, though it lead up hill. And, after all, it is it not a worthy task to teach ourselves how to employ the goods the gods provide, that we may neither make too much nor too little, but that they may best subserve to the nourishment of brain and body? And has not the cook a mission, of which she will be called to render an account?—Harper's Bazar.

Arctic Explorations.

The story of Arctic exploration is always an entrancing one, even when told with the dry curtness of a logbook. It is a story of battle in its intensest forms—of brave men raised upon to exercise the utmost fortitude, and unceasing watchfulness and ingenuity to meet and overcome the giant forces of nature in its most inhospitable moods. Many glorious triumphs are inscribed upon its pages, and also sad records of defeat and death. But whether the feeling of pride up he pride or sorrow, the same absorbing interest attaches to the story, especially when the reader is an Englishman. American has gained honor by her Arctic explorations, and Austria, Germany and Sweden have left traces of their nationalities in the frozen North; but England has always regarded the work as her own peculiar heritage, bequeathed them by the "long line" of Arctic adventurers from Davis, Frobisher, Hudson and Baffin down to the ill-fated Franklin. Certainly the two expeditions in the last named expedition did honor to her for many years, but the work was only suspended. For years after the mysterious disappearance of the Erebus and Terror, English interest in Arctic exploration was clouded over. Expedition after expedition, however, but the object of each was primarily to clear up the mystery in which Franklin's fate was wrapped, and when the lonely little Fox, equipped by Lady Franklin, found the fatal paper on King William's Island which told of the abandonment of the Erebus and Terror, the shock and disappointment to the Nation were such that for further attempts at Arctic exploration on the part of England were postponed indefinitely. Indeed the special discovery Franklin had made—the discovery of the Northwest passage—has never since been attempted and probably never will be. But through all this long period the Royal Geographical Society never lost heart. Year after year successive expeditions, many a lifetime in the main, many a trial of temper. Young people go into the home kitchen and dabble in cookies and flummeries, and think they have mastered the noble art, when, in truth, they are ignorant of its rudiments, and believe that the ability to bungle constitutes Capoletta fare and grand souffle is a recommendation of a good cook; and these are all well in their way, but only finger-work. HOME, FARM AND GARDEN.

—Corn-plowing and hay and wheat harvest are going to get a closer corner on farmers than usual this year. Vigilance, gentlemen. Up and at it.—State Register.

—Thomas Meehan says the objection against watering when the sun shines on the plants is a purely theoretical one, and appears only in the writings of those who have had but little actual experience. His advice is to water whenever the plants need it.

—There is no occupation which is so sure of a return for labor as agriculture. The risk of manufacturers and middle-men is three-fold that of farmers, but their enterprise is so great that they seldom succumb to pressure till it becomes crushing.

—Tea ice-Cream. (A Massachusetts Receipt.)—Pour over four tablespoonfuls of old Hyson tea a pint of cream; scald in a custard kettle, or by placing the dish containing the cream in a kettle of boiling water; strain into a pint of cold cream, scald again, and when luke warm add four eggs and three-quarters of a pound of sugar, well beaten together; let it cool and freeze.

—To Kill the Currant Worm.—I see a number asking what will destroy the gooseberry and currant worm. I will give them a sure remedy, although a little too late to save them this year. Make a strong brine, strong enough to keep meat, and sprinkle the bushes well. The brine kills the worms almost instantly. This is the best and safest with mine, and others have tried it and call it a sure cure.—Philadelphia Pennsylvania Farmer.

—"Pocket-Books."—To one quart of warm milk add a cup of butter, four tablespoonfuls of sugar, and two well-beaten eggs; then stir in flour enough to make a moderately stiff sponge; add a small cupful of yeast, and let the dough rise, afterward, mix in flour enough to make a soft dough, and let it rise again; then dissolve a lump of soda the size of a bean in a spoon of milk, work it in the dough, and roll into sheets half so inch thick; spread with thin layer of butter, cut into squares and fold over pocket-book shape; set them stand in the pans, to rise, a little while before baking.

—Every piece of horse-radish grows; if we take a piece of root about an inch in length, about the size of a large bean, and put it an inch below the surface of the prepared ground, a short piece will come to the surface with only a crown, and another, and another portion will descend and probably fork to form a root; but instead of this, if we make a hole a foot or so deep in the ground, with a dibble, and let the little piece of root drop to the bottom, a clean, straight sprout will come to the surface, and this will in time make as clean and thrifty a market piece as could be desired.—Exchange.

Why Chicks Die.

A subscriber writes to us asking why his chicks die off so rapidly, rarely living more than two or three weeks. He does not tell us the treatment they receive, but in the following from the Massachusetts Ploughman, he will probably find the answer. In our own poultry yard we have been very successful with young chicks, and have fed broken rice alternately with the cracked corn, giving an occasional feed of potatoes by way of a treat. "The great point in raising chickens is to keep them eating all the time, or at any rate, to keep their digestive organs continually well supplied. 'Short commons' are not economical in chicken rearing.

The common custom is to keep a dish of "Indian meal dough" mixed up, and two or three times a day a lot is thrown to the chickens. If they eat it, well and good; if not, and the chances are they will not, they having become tired of one single article of diet set before them day after day, it stands and sours. If a quantity is thus found uneaten the next feed is likely to be a light one, and the chickens driven by hunger, finally devour the sour stuff; the result is cholera or some other fatal disease sets in and their owner wonders "why my chickens are all dying off." In our own practice we find that small quantities of varied food if given to the chickens at frequent intervals and regularly is the best way for the young now to keep up their digestive organs in a healthy condition, and we have succeeded in reaching a higher percentage than any of the public institutions.

Why Chicks Die.

A subscriber writes to us asking why his chicks die off so rapidly, rarely living more than two or three weeks. He does not tell us the treatment they receive, but in the following from the Massachusetts Ploughman, he will probably find the answer. In our own poultry yard we have been very successful with young chicks, and have fed broken rice alternately with the cracked corn, giving an occasional feed of potatoes by way of a treat. "The great point in raising chickens is to keep them eating all the time, or at any rate, to keep their digestive organs continually well supplied. 'Short commons' are not economical in chicken rearing.

The common custom is to keep a dish of "Indian meal dough" mixed up, and two or three times a day a lot is thrown to the chickens. If they eat it, well and good; if not, and the chances are they will not, they having become tired of one single article of diet set before them day after day, it stands and sours. About Hay.

A good supply of hay on every farm, adequate to the wants of the live stock which the farmer intends to keep, is indispensable. It is apparent that the stock is to prove profitable. There is no doubt that many valuable animals are annually sacrificed to a false economy in feeding indifferent or poor hay or straw. A man who follows such a policy stands in his own light, and if he has a chance to better conditions sooner he sells his stock and quits the business the better it will be for himself and his animals. He will do well to remember that the loss of a horse, or a good cow, or a few sheep, and the "run-down" condition of his entire stock, more than counterbalances any saving that can be effected by using inferior, badly cured, woody and musty hay. It is the poorest kind of economy in fact, to attempt to be called by that term. In converting the grasses and forage plants into hay, or curing them, the object is, of course, to so treat them as to expel the water they contain (which amounts to nearly two-thirds of their weight), with the least loss of their nutritive properties. To secure this object the grass must be cut at that stage when the greatest weight of produce with the maximum of nutritious matter is obtained, and then it is necessary to so conduct the drying process that nutritive juices shall not be lost by the washing of rains. While newly cut grass is quite green a shower of rain may not materially injure it, but repeated rains and harvesting will destroy much of its value. When ready to cut, grass and clover contain sugar, gum, mucilage, albuminous and other valuable compounds, which are to be retained if possible by hurrying and breaking the hay.

With the appliances and facilities now within the reach of farmers for saving the hay crop, this work can be accomplished speedily at the right time provided always the weather will permit—and the maximum of its nutritive value secured.—Western Rural.

"Under Fire."

The first time that a soldier goes into action he fancies the shot that he hears whizzing through the air is aimed at him. But if he is not hit at first, he soon acquires a sort of fatalistic feeling that he never will be. The eve of a battle might be supposed to be a solemn moment. I have been at several, and I never perceived the vestige of solemnity, nor—so far as I could perceive—did it strike anyone that the next day he might be killed. The thoughts of everyone were concentrated first on supper, and then on finding a comparatively comfortable place in which to sleep. Fighting produces in the all not immediately engaged are simply bored. If ever a hand-to-hand fight takes places it is due to some hungrier being in command on one side or the other. Most of the regiments engaged do not see the enemy. Attacking in column and bayonet charges are things of the past. Shells and bullets are fired into a position or upon troops advancing. The victory is decided by artillery and breech-loader firing. Those who can concentrate the heaviest fire upon particular strategical points win. So mechanical is the whole affair that it is an admitted axiom that if one-third of the best regiment in the world is put hors de combat, the remainder will execute a strategical maneuver to the rear.—Cor. London Truth.

—Two old Texas ranchers, who had just helped bury a neighbor, were talking about religion, and one asked the other how pious he thought it was possible for a man to get in this world, if he was in real earnest. "Wal," said the other, reflectively, "I think if a man gets so he can swop steers or trade horses without lyin', he'll be purty full out for the better land above ha has a release."

—Barber Ice the institution and should be guarded from attacks of Colic, Phthisic, etc., by Dr. Bull's Baby Syrup. Price, 25 cents a bottle.

College Professor (to Junior who has been taking advantage of his absent-mindedness) :—"Young man, I find on looking over the results that this makes the fifth time in two years that you have been granted leave of absence to attend your grandmother's funeral."—Harper's Bazar.

Why ought poultry-keeping to be a most profitable business? Because for every grain you give a fowl it gives a peck.

Poverty and Suffering.

"I was dragged down with debt, poverty and suffering for years, caused by a sick family and large bills for doctoring, which did them no good. I was completely discouraged, until one year ago, by the advice of my pastor, I procured Hop Bitters and commenced their use, and in one month we were all well, and none of us have seen a sick day since, and I want to say to all poor men, you can keep your families well a year with Hop Bitters for less than one doctor's visit will cost.—Know A Workingman."

Wichoff's Tonic!—A Safe, Sure, and Scientific Cure.—The unprecedented sale of this world-renowned medicine proves incontestably that no remedy has superseded the use of this reliable tonic. Its action upon men found as hard as coal to yield to its soothing influence, and no liver so torpid/indolent as not to give to its benign control bilious secretions, and no Chill or Fever has yet refused to fall before the Bitters.—Fuller, Finlay & Co., Proprietors, New Orleans.

Vegetine is Sold by All Druggists.

At this season of the year the human system is liable to become overcharged from the impurities of the blood or to discharge the excess of bile. If nature is not assisted in her efforts, severe bilious attacks, or prostration of the nervous system, causing great suffering and even death. A little timely precaution, however, will prevent all this, and may be found in that favorite household remedy, SIMMONS' LIVER REGULATOR.

Simmons' Liver Regulator has been in use for half a century and there is not one single instance on record where it has failed to effect a cure when taken in time, according to the directions. It is without doubt the greatest Liver Medicine in the world; is perfectly harmless, being carefully compounded from vegetable matter, containing no mercury or any injurious mineral substance. It takes the place of quinine and calomel, and has superseded those medicines in places where they have heretofore been extensively used. Prepared in a manner from your druggist, do not delay, give it a fair trial, and you will be more than satisfied with the results obtained.

CAUTION!

As there are a number of imitations offered to the public, we would caution the community to look to Perkins or Prepared SIMMONS' LIVER REGULATOR, unless in our engraved wrapper, with trade-mark, stamp and signature unbroken. Note other is genuine.

"JUST AS GOOD."

One of my friends who had been using Pellons' Compound Syrup of Hypophosphites for dyspepsia, was induced by one of our druggists to try something or other instead of Hypophosphites, which he said was "just as good, if not better." The case of my friend a bottle—tangent him that if he would commit his safety, he must insist upon having Pellons' Compound Syrup Hypophosphites, and no other.

No organ of thought or action can be complained with out the sustenance of the blood, and no organ can be employed safely or with impunity without a supply of healthy blood. With healthy blood the system is proof against disease, and every organ is strengthened and developed, whether they be muscular or intellectual. By the use of Fellows' Compound Syrup of Hypophosphites the blood is speedily enriched and purified, and so made capable of producing a sound mind and a sound body.

HUNT'S REMEDY

is not a new compound, but HUNT'S REMEDY has been in use for many years, and can refer to all classes of people for its virtues. Ask your druggist about it. HUNT'S REMEDY is a specific for Kidney and Urinary diseases and Female Weakness. Send for pamphlet.

IN a dispatch received at Army Headquarters in San Francisco, on the 10th, dated Birch Creek, July 9, Gen. Howard says he found the Indians in force on the height near Butte Creek, and advanced two companies, one under Theuckmorton, and attacked the hostiles and drove them from their position to another higher up, which was almost impregnable, but after a fierce assault from different sides at once the Indians again fled, abandoning their horses, provisions, ammunition and camp material. They made for the thick timber, crowning the Blue Ridge, where Gen. made another stand from which they were dislodged and driven from the summit of the mountains. Five enlisted men were wounded during the engagement, and about twenty horses were killed. It was impossible to state the loss of the enemy. The officers and men are said to have behaved in the most gallant manner throughout the affair. The news from John Day Valley, on the 9th, was to the effect that the inhabitants were at the mercy of a large number of savages, who invested some 4,000 square miles of territory, combining all the natural facilities for a prolonged war.

GEN. SHERMAN has issued a general order instructing the officers of the army as to their duties under the Posse passed by Congress as a part of the Army Appropriation bill. Gen. Sherman calls attention to the proviso of the Constitution and acts of Congress relating to the army understood to be exempt from the operation of the new law, and under which alone will officers of the army permit the use of troops under their command to aid the civil authorities as a posse comitatus, or in execution of the laws. Applications for the use of troops for such purposes must be forwarded through the military channel to the Adjutant-General for the consideration and action of the President.

IN New York, on the 11th, Sec'y Sherman had an informal conference with the representatives of the late Syndicate, relative to the question of resumption. Mr. Sherman expressed confidence in his ability to resume at once, if necessary, and the bankers were generally of the opinion that there was nothing in the way of such a course. The Secretary said that, although he could not begin to redeem greenbacks before January, yet it was in his power to pay checks and drafts upon the Treasury in specie, and intimated that he would soon begin to do so. A member of the Syndicate said, after the conference, that he would not be surprised to see the Treasury paying gold on or before Aug. 1.

NEWS was received at Umatilla, Ore., on the 11th, that the hostiles whipped back by Gen. Howard had started eastward, for the Snake River, along the ridge of the Blue Mountains. In a dispatch to Gov. Chadwick, dated the 9th, Gen. Howard states that he had apparently met the main body of the Indians. He had sent a column in pursuit of those who escaped after the battle of the previous day.

AT Beloit, Wis., on the 12th, a number of tramps, who were engaged in defying the authorities, and in efforts to capture a freight train to convey them on their way to Minnesota, were sentenced to from five to thirty days each in the County Jail.

EXTREME heat was experienced at St. Louis, on the 15th, the mercury ranging from 95 deg. to 101 deg. in the shade. Over 150 cases of sunstroke occurred on that day, between forty and fifty being fatal. There were fifteen fatal cases on the 16th, and over twenty on the 14th. Extreme heat prevailed generally throughout the West, on the 15th, and several deaths from sunstroke are reported from different localities.

THE news from Pendleton, Ore., on the 15th, was to the effect that the troops under Capt. Miles had thrown the Indians into the Foot Hills, near Cayuse Station, after a four or five hours' fight at long range in the valley. Several horses were captured, and quite a number of Indians were killed. The volunteers did well, and were complimented by the officers in command. The Indians were surrounded, and further fighting would ensue.

The resolutions adopted arraign the Republican party for its alleged corruption in office, its unwise legislation, etc., and its alleged stealing of the Presidency from the people and placing a fraud in the Presidential chair; indorse the investigation into the Electoral frauds; declare that gold and silver coin is the money of the Constitution, and that all paper currency should be convertible into such coin at the will of the holder; oppose the further reduction of the volume of the currency, and indorse the action of Congress prohibiting such reduction, and congratulate the country upon a reduction of $30,000,000 in the National expenditure during the last four years.

THE Missouri Democracy met in State Convention, on the 10th, and nominated candidates for Supreme Judge, Register of Lands, State Superintendent of Schools and Railway Commissioner, all except the latter (A. The Mayor had issued a proclamation several days before, prohibiting the proposed demonstration, and stating that he should use his authority to suppress any effort in that direction by members of the Society. The Orangemen persisted in their determination to parade in a body, notwithstanding the Mayor's order, up to a late hour in the forenoon of the 12th, when, ascertaining that they would not have the aid of the military under the Police Magistrates, but that the latter would be used indiscriminately to quell any riotous proceedings, the march was abandoned. To test the legality of the Orange Association, and its consequent right to parade in public, several of the leaders, including D. Grant, County Master, and John Hamilton, County Secretary, of the Association, were arrested and subsequently released on bail. During the day a young man wearing an Orange lily was attacked by two special Constables and struck across the head. As an Orangeman was proceeding home in a cab late in the afternoon, he was attacked by an infuriated mob and was very badly beaten. OUR PARIS LETTER.

EDITOR SENTINEL.

As a general rule I haven't much of an opinion of a man who talks about the weather, and so to the man who writes about it—unless indeed he be Old Probabilities Meyer or some other high meteorological muck a muck—why he is simply beneath criticism. Nothing in this world is so utterly and wildly exasperating as to have a fellow come up to you while you are mopping your countenance or wiping out of your neck the beads that are rapidly wilting your clean collar, and with his inane grin ask, "Well, it did warm enough for you?" I mention these facts to prove that I appreciate the threadbare character of the subject; but what is a man to do when this is the subject uppermost in every mind, when the papers are filled with nothing else, and when even the dogs' in the street pant their complaints and commiserations to each other at every corner?

I don't know what the matter is, whether the sun, in defiance of the astronomers, has got twenty or thirty million miles nearer to us than usual or whether the blame is to be laid at 39, Louis door, for starting this abominable "wave." But settle the responsibility as you please, the fact remains that we are visited with a most disgusting state of the atmosphere. The story of Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego has always furnished one of the stock arguments to the literal minded sceptics at Scripture truth; but, our survival through the past week is almost enough to shut their mouths, for it is not much of an exaggeration to say that New York has been a fiery furnace for several days. Every pore in our bodies is like an Artesian well, flowing night and day, and, to make our condition more intolerable, the air, even with the mercury jumping its head against the top of the glass, seems so saturated with moisture as to have lost all power of absorbing the perspiration.

While our location so near the ocean renders our plight more tolerable than that of the western cities from which we have such terrible reports of suffering and death, the heat has still pressed very heavily upon New York City. Many cases of sun-stroke are reported, but they represent only a small part of the casualties. The majority of fatal cases are not sudden enough to be classed under that head. They occur in the packed tenements, where there is bad ventilation and worse sewerage, and where women and children and the sick of all ages and both sexes have died by the hundred, actually smothered to death. Business is neglected as far as possible, and not even the veriest Gradgrinds of the counting house find it in their hearts to complain that our humane Postmaster James has temporarily interdicted the midday delivery of mail matter by the overworked and underpaid army of letter carriers—something which has not occurred before since the fierce pull of the centennial summer.

But, whew! I find it don't make me any cooler to write about our burning miseries, so let us change the subject.

On Wednesday morning that ever youthful Aleddin of journalism Mr. Jas. Gordon Bennett, having graciously decided some days previous to honor his native land with a call, stepped ashore from the French steamer St. Laurent, and stood upon the dock in gloomy magnificence during the unloading and custom-house inspection of his baggage, which, judging from accounts, must have formed the larger part of the ship's cargo. It consisted of no less than 126 pieces, consisting of trunks, packing cases, bags, packages of guns, umbrellas, canes, and sporting implements. His horses, carriages, and Polo ponies and various other cattle had preceded their lord and master, and were already ensconced in their quarters at Newport, whither Mr. Bennet, and his sister, who was accompanied him everywhere in Europe, and who now returns with him immediately married.

Miss Bennett, it is said, is to be married in this city. It seems a great mistake that Britons are not born an English lord, so closely does he imitate the appearance and habits of that "effete aristocracy." He owns four or five estates in different parts of the world, including a "shooting box" in England, and the regulation "hotel" in Paris, and evidently feels at ease at home in either of the latter than in any part of this country. His stay here will be short. He cannot stand the "dearth of country" more than a few months at a time, and before winter sets in will be re-established with all his retinue of men and beasts in one of his foreign residences.

Two once noted fugitives from justice have been brought into court to answer for their crimes within ten days. The first to be apprehended was William E. Gray, the prince of forgers and confidence men, who in 1869 fled from anxious creditors in Wall street, who wanted some half a million from him, and whose subsequent history in England and on the Continent, reads like the most wildly improbable dime novel. He eluded the law for nine years, but was at last apprehended and brought back to New York, where he now awaits trial. Very shortly after the flight of Gray, Edward Oakley, a bank cashier, was found to have embezzled $300,000. He was indicted in January, 1870, but jumped his bail and ran away to Canada. Lately he ventured back to his old haunts, and on Thursday was arrested, and placed like Gray, in durance vile. Chickens, curses, and criminals always come home to roost.

The Home Insurance Company are just out with their fifteenth semi-annual statement, a document which, as this company has never been known to suspected of taking such liberties with figures as corporations of the kind are apt to do, shows the thoroughly sound and prosperous condition of one of our oldest and best fire companies. The statement shows a net surplus of considerably over a million of dollars, a reserve of two millions, and a cash capital of three millions, giving for the protection of its policyholders assets aggregating between six and seven millions of money.

We are now experiencing the regulation scare, which comes around every summer in about the same shape, over the breaking out of terrible epidemics. It is only about a week ago that we were startled with the report of two deaths, near by, in Connecticut, from Asiatic cholera, and now we have the cheering intelligence of six cases of yellow fever in the Brooklyn Navy Yard, of which three have already terminated fatally. These occurrences will furnish us with pleasant food for thought until the setting in of the hydrophobia season, which cannot be much longer delayed.

RADIX.

An Undeniable Truth.

Liver is King.

The Liver is the imperial organ of the whole human system, as it controls the life, health and happiness of man When it is disturbed in its proper action, all kinds of ailments are the natural result. The digestion of food, the movements of the heart and blood, the action of the brain and nervous system, are all immediately connected with the workings of the Liver. It has been successfully proved that Green's August Flower is unequalled in curing all persons afflicted with Dyspepsia or Liver Complaint, and all the numerous symptoms that result from an unhealthy condition of the Liver and Stomach. TUESDAY, JULY 30, - - 1878

OUR RADIX LETTER.

New York, July 20, 1878.

EDITOR SENTINEL:

As a general rule I invent much of an opinion of a man who talks about the weather, and as to the man who writes about it—unless indeed he be Old Probabilities Meyer or some other high meteorological muck a muck—why he is simply beneath criticism. Nothing in the world is so utterly and wildly exasperating as to have a fellow come up to you while you are mopping your countenance or wiping out of your neck the beads that are rapidly wilting your clean collar, and with his inane grin ask, "Well, it this warm enough for you?" I mention these facts to prove that I appreciate the threadbare character of the subject; but what is a man to do when this is the subject uppermost in every mind, when the papers are filled with nothing else, and when even the dogs' in the street pant their complaints and commiserations to each other at every corner?

I don't know what the matter is, whether the sun, in defiance of the astronomers, has got twenty or thirty million miles nearer to us than usual or whether the blame is to be laid at St. Louis door, for starting this abominable "wave." But settle the responsibility as you please, the fact remains that we are visited with a most disgusting state of the atmosphere. The story of Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego has always furnished one of the stock arguments to the literal method of reading Scripture truths but, our servitude through the past week is almost enough to shut their mouths, for, it is not much of an exaggeration to say that, New York has been a fiery furnace for several days. Every pore in our bodies is like an Artesian well, flowing night and day; and, to make our condition more miserable, the air, even with the mercury bumping its head against the top of the glass, seems so saturated with moisture as to have lost all power of absorbing the perspiration.

While our location so near the ocean renders our plight more tolerable than that of the western cities from which we have such terrible reports of suffering and death, the heat has still pressed very heavily upon New York City. Many cases of sun stroke are reported, but they represent only a small part of the casualities. The majority of fatal cases are not sudden enough to be classed under that head. They occur in the packed tenements, where there is bad ventilation and worse sewerage, and where women and children and the sick of all ages and both sexes have died by the hundred, actually smothered to death. Business is neglected as far as possible, and not even the veriest Grudgrinds of the counting house find it in their hearts to complain that our humane Postmaster James has temporarily intermitted the midday delivery of mail matter by the overworked and underpaid army of letter carriers—something which has not occurred before since the fierce pall of the centennial summer.

But, whew! I find it don't make me any cooler to write about our burning miseries, so let us change the subject.

On Wednesday morning that ever youthful Aladdin of journalism Mr. Jas. Gordon Bennett, having graciously decided some days previous to honor his native land with a call, stepped ashore from the French steamer St. Laurent, and stood upon the dock in gloomy magnificence during the unloading and custom-house inspection of his baggage, which, judging from accounts, must have formed the larger part of the ship's cargo. It consisted of no less than 128 packs, consisting of trunks, packing cases, bags, packages of guns, umbrellas, canes, and sporting implements. His horses, carriages, and Polo ponies and various other cattle had preceded their lord and master, and were already ensconced in their quarters at Newport whither Mr. Bennett and his sister, who has accompanied him everywhere in Europe, and who now returns with him immediately married. Miss Bennett, it is said, is to be married in this city. It seems a great mistake that Bennett was not born an Englishman, so closely does he imitate the appearance and habits of that "effete aristocracy." He owns four or five estates in different parts of the world, including a "shooting box" in England, and the regulation "hotel" in Paris, and evidently feels more at home in either of the latter than in any part of this country. His stay here will be short. He cannot stand this "blarsted country" more than a few months at a time, and before winter sets in will be re-established with all his retinue of men and boys in one of his foreign residences.

Two once noted fugitives from justice have been brought into court to answer for their crimes within ten days. The first to be apprehended was William E. Gray, the prince of forgers and confidence men, who in 1869 fled from anxious creditors in Wall street, who wanted some half a million from him, and whose subsequent history in England and on the Continent, reads like the most wildly improbable dime novel. He eluded the law for nine years, but was at last apprehended and brought back to New York, where he now awaits trial. Very shortly after the flight of Gray, Edward Oakley, a bank cashier, was found to have embezzled $250,000. He was indicted in January, 1870, but jumped his bail and ran away to Canada. Lately he ventured back to his old haunts, and on Thursday was arrested, and placed like Gray, in durance vile. Chickens, crows, and criminals always come home to roost.

The Home Insurance Company are just out with their fifteen semi-annual statement a document which, as this company has never failed to teach us expected of taking such liberties with figures as corporations of the kind are apt to do, shows the thoroughly sound and prosperous condition of one of our oldest and best fire companies. The statement shows a net surplus of nearly a million of dollars, a reserve of two millions, and a cash capital of three millions, among for the protection of its policyholders sums aggregating between six and seven millions of money.

We are now experiencing the regulation news, which comes around every summer in about the same shape, every side breaking out of terrific epidemics. It is only about a week ago that we were startled with the report of two deaths, near by, in Connecticut, from Asiatic cholera, and now we have the cheering intelligence of six cases of yellow fever in the Brooklyn Navy Yard, of which three have already terminated fatally. These occurrences will furnish us with pleasant food for thought until the setting in of the hydrophobia season, which cannot be much longer delayed.

RADIX.

THE INVESTIGATION.

THE Potter Committee met on the 19th. Mr. Butler being absent. A secret session was held, at which a recent letter from Secretary Sherman was considered. In this letter Mr. Sherman states that the Committee had accepted evidence according to grave but shadowy and intimidation had not prevailed at the elections in certain parishes in Louisiana, and could not, therefore, in justice deny him the right, to prove that fraud, whipping and all forms of intimidation did not prevail to such parishes, sufficient to affect any Republican vote that was cast in the ballot. Mr. Sherman also stated that he was prepared to submit testimony, if the committee desired it. The Committee on Washington, to report the charges against him. Information being received by the Committee that Gen. Butler would not arrive until the 24th, an adjournment was had until that date.

A special to the Chicago Interview says the Committee, at its executive session, decided to call for the witnesses asked for by Mr. Sherman—the Republican visiting statesman to Louisiana.

THE Committee resumed its session on the 24th, Mr. Butler being present and conducting the examination of Senator Kellogg of Louisiana. Witness said the elections in that State in 1876 were entirely legal. He gave a detailed statement of the consummation of the legislature, and stated that Gov. Packard was legally inaugurated on the 8th of January, 1877, at which time there was a Republican quorum in both houses. Mr. Butler submitted a statement purporting to be the returning Board's figures, which showed that after the Board had thrown out such votes as it deemed possible to elect the Democratic candidates in the two Districts in which there was fraud, they were defeated, whereupon the Board threw out enough votes to elect the Republican candidates and declared them elected. In answer to questions by Mr. Butler witness stated that he first heard of the forgeries about the electoral returns from Anderson on his return from Washington. Anderson admitted he had been opened at the request of Packard's counsel. Witness and Anderson had left the impression that he (Anderson) had opened the letter. He did not remember who was present in the room when he opened the letter, nor did he recognize the seals of the other letters. He did not remember whether Anderson had opened any other letters. Witness was unable to say how many votes were supplied to the second set of certificates.

THE examination of Senator Kellogg was resumed on the 25th. Witness said that, in his opinion, had Hayes recognized Gov. Packard by telegram immediately after the former's inauguration, and followed up the action by an official recognition, the people of Louisiana, including the Nichols faction, would have created no trouble. He considered Packard elected as fairly as the Hayes Electors, so far as Louisiana was concerned. Gen. Grant had telegraphed to the witness a day or two before he went out of office, stating that he had hesitated in recognizing Gov. Packard in consequence of there having been a commission appointed to investigate the result of the Louisiana election. Referring to the McVeagh Commission, witness had learned, but fact, that Mr. Sherman's letter had been found among D. A. Weber's papers, and that Mrs. Jenks had procured possession of it through her intimacy with the Weber family. Witness then related what took place in New Orleans and spoken of the Sherman letter. Witness remembered the publication of Weber's affidavit without protest, and did not remember of having conversed with him regarding it printed after the election. He had requested Anderson to call on him, and had given him Weber's address in Chicago, but he remained in New Orleans and went from there to Europe. He had been made familiar from Chicago-National bank, witness said he had letters from Anderson, but no one of the letters had the intimation was used to put members of the returning Board again in office as Democratic electors. He did not know that members of the Returning Board had been threatened that they would be indicted for perjury. In answer to questions by Mr. Butler, witness stated that he first heard of the forgeries about the electoral returns from Anderson on his return from Washington. Anderson admitted he had opened the envelope, and had left the impression that he (Anderson) had opened the letter. He did not remember who was present in the room when he opened the letter, nor did he recognize the seals of the other letters. He did not remember whether Anderson had opened any other letters. The number of votes were supplied to the second set of certificates.

He did not remember who was present in the room when he opened the letter, nor did he recognize the seals of the other letters. He did not remember whether Anderson had opened any other letters. The number of votes were supplied to the second set of certificates.

THE examination of Senator Kellogg was resumed on the 27th. Witness said that, in his opinion, had Hayes recognized Gov. Packard by telegram immediately after the former's inauguration, and followed up the action by an official recognition, the people of Louisiana, including the Nichols faction, would have created no trouble. He considered Packard elected as fairly as the Hayes Electors, so far as Louisiana was concerned. Gen. Grant had telegraphed to the witness a day or two before he went out of office, stating that he had hesitated in recognizing Gov. Packard in consequence of there having been a commission appointed to investigate the result of the Louisiana election. Referring to the McVeagh Commission, witness had learned, but fact, that Mr. Sherman's letter had been found among D. A. Weber's papers, and that Mrs. Jenks had procured possession of it through her intimacy with the Weber family. Witness then related what took place in New Orleans and spoken of the Sherman letter. Witness remembered the publication of Weber's affidavit without protest, and did not remember of having conversed with him regarding it printed after the election. He had requested Anderson to call on him, and had given him Weber's address in Chicago, but he remained in New Orleans and went from there to Europe. He had been made familiar from a Chicago National Bank, witness said he had letters from Anderson, but no one of the letters had the intimation was used to put members of the Returning Board again in office as Democratic electors. He did not know that members of the Returning Board had been threatened that they would be indicted for perjury. In answer to questions by Mr. Butler, witness stated that he first heard of the forgeries about the electoral returns from Anderson on his return from Washington. Anderson admitted he had opened the envelope, and had left the impression that he (Anderson) had opened the letter. He did not remember who was present in the room when he opened the letter, nor did he recognize the seals of the other letters. He did not remember whether Anderson had opened any other letters. The number of votes were supplied to the second set of certificates.

THE examination of Senator Kellogg was resumed on the 28th. Witness said that, in his opinion, had Hayes recognized Gov. Packard by telegram immediately after the former's inauguration, and followed up the action by an official recognition, the people of Louisiana, including the Nichols faction, would have created no trouble. He considered Packard elected as fairly as the Hayes Electors, so far as Louisiana was concerned. Gen. He did not remember who was present in the room when he opened the letter, nor did he recognize the seals of the other letters. He did not remember whether Anderson had opened any other letters. The number of votes were supplied to the second set of certificates.

THE examination of Senator Kellogg was resumed on the 29th. Mr. Kellogg said he did not know that any telegram had been sent by Mr. Hayes to the members of the Returning Board during the progress of the count, and did not remember that he had ever spoken to Mr. Weber in regard to his brother's standing him up in the presidential contest. He knew Mrs. Jenks, in answer to her application for the appointment of her husband to a place in the New Orleans Custom-House, but did not remember whether or not he referred to them to the so-called "Sherman letter." The testimony of Mr. Jenks, that he and his wife had corresponded with witness for a period years, was false, as nothing passed between them. The correspondence had all occurred in 1877. Mrs. Jenks, he said, came to Washington at her request and in her interest. He did not consider Anderson a friend. Referring to the letter of Mrs. Jenks he had always thought to be an honest, upright gentleman and a good politician, and he knew nothing of the standing of Mrs. Jenks. Witness was not personally interested in the matter of the evidence of intimidation in East and West Feliciana, but had no personal knowledge of it. He considered the testimony of Bradley, Superintendent of Railroad Police, to be legal testimony, stating that he had never prepared a protest in fact. As an attorney he had never known Packard to be informed by Gov. Packard, weeks before the election, that the race of the Republicans in East Feliciana would be lost by reason of intimidation. In answer to the Committee's list of persons killed, among witnesses on which Republicans were murdered, on election day, witness could not recollect. He knew Lowrey, a Democrat, before the election of 1875, and could not say that he was killed, although the impression prevailed. Lowrey was murdered for political reasons, that was generally understood. In answer to Mr. Butler, Mr. Kellogg stated that some of the Committee's letters to Packard were sent by the President, and had been addressed to Federal officers and that some of the Supervisors had also received appointments. Mr. Butler asked if any of these persons had special qualifications for other other than legal appointments with Louisiana politics. Mr. Hiscock objected to the question on the ground that the tendency was to make the Administration appear ridiculous. Mr. Butler retorted that it was impossible to render the Administration more ridiculous than it appeared itself. The Chairman finally allowed the question, and Mr. Kellogg stated that, with the exception of Mr. Packard, all were competent to perform the duties they were appointed to perform, and that of sufficient character to justify their appointment. Mr. Butler's letter to Packard, in which he stated that he had been informed that Packard had appointed a number of persons to office who were not competent to perform the duties of the offices to which they were appointed, was then read. Witness said he knew nothing of the matter. Hayward, the counsellor-at-law, was not employed by the Returning Board. Witness said he was present in the warehouse and other departments at least five days per day, during the canvass. Here was called to the witness a letter from Packard to Kellogg, dated Nov. 8, 1876, in which Packard stated that he had been informed that Kellogg had appointed a number of persons to office who were not competent to perform the duties of the offices to which they were appointed, and requesting Kellogg to send a list of the persons appointed by him

THOSE in confidently looking for wool to a termination for the present dearness, and is already getting his agents at work with this end remotely in view. A more exec ent candidate to beat than slippery Samuel could not be nominated.

"Ben. Grant and Zach Chandler," remarked the Barron Independent paper, "were spoken of freely, with heavy rocks and quarter-feed land kickers are becoming very popular with the American people in these days of Communistic tramp, demagogues, and repudiaters."

The gr eenbacks that paid the cost of fighting the battles of the Union, and were worth at one time only thirty five cents on the dollar, are now as good as coin. Right at this time the rebel guerrillas who denounced them originally, and call all they could to depreciate them, want to send them on short forwarded coins again. The result would be white Coin for the bondholder, and depreciated paper for working men.

A mean joke was developed the other day in connection with the complaints against the management of the New York Post Office, showing how absurdly malicious and futile some of them are. The Postmaster received a written charge that the writer, a boy, had been kicked by some of the men who run the thr ee-letter. It was discovered first, that no such person existed at the address given, second, that all the men who run the elevator have lost one leg apiece.

The time was when it took two $10 greenbacks to buy a barrel of flour. Now you can buy a barrel of flour for one $10 bill and have $4 left to pur chase provisions or clothing. These are the kind of dollars people want, and, by making our present basis of green backs equal in value to gold and silver, that is the kind they will hereafter have. This is what specie-resumption means, and this is what the so-called "National" and "Greenback" who oppose specie resumption and favor the issue of "absolute paper money," would prevent if they could. Hence it is that they deserve to be called political blatherskites.

It is well known that in no portion of the world are wages so high as they are in the United States, and that the industrial classes are better fed, better clothed, and more liberally educated here than elsewhere. Can these conditions be attributed to aught else than the policy of protection to home industries? Reverse that policy, and under a free-trade tariff our markets would, in less than ninety days, be filled with the products of half paid foreign artisans and workingmen. The problem admits of no other solution. Free trade would give employment to the industrial classes abroad, and to the same extent take the work from our own people. It enriches English, German and French manufacturers and impoverishes those of our own country, feeds foreign operatives and starves our own.

Best goods lowest prices at FOX, ROSE & BUTTARS.

WITH rapid strides Charlevoix is advancing to the front rank of Northern Resorts. As a shipping point, its importance has been recognized by the Government, and appropriations are yearly made for our already accessible and commodious harbor. As a farming country the region adjacent to Charlevoix is a mine of agricultural wealth which needs only industry to develop.

C. & B. are selling tea 5½ lbs for 100 but their celebrated 50cts tea is the cheapest.

THE Petoskey Record calls the attention of outside people to the superior adaptability of this country to stock-raising, and we echo the sentiment. The story of long, severe winters in Northern Michigan is a provokingly accepted fact among those in more southern latitudes, but it is untrue, nevertheless. Cattle do well here, and experience has proven that stock raising can be made one of the most profitable branches of husbandry.

THE Petoskey Record thinks the Baptists "made a mistake in locating at Charlevoix." Yes, everything is a mistake that does not work to the glory of Petoskey, the Babylon of the North—the shrine of poker players. Everything that fails to drop into the hungry maws of the voracious gluttons brings out a growl of envy. Had Charlevoix the railroad connection that Petoskey enjoys, the latter place would be forgotten in one change of the moon. Make a memorandum of that for future reference, Mr. Record. As it is, the natural adaptability of Charlevoix as a summer resort so far over-shadows that of Petoskey that the very slight difference in accessibility fades into insignificance. Don't talk any more about "mistakes."

Maine Republicanism is of the wholesome sort on the financial question. The platform shows marks of the vigor and ability of Mr. Blaine's leadership

Another Enoch Arden.

Truth is always stranger than fiction, but we can only be made to believe it by startling cases like this. Tennyson has immortalized "Enoch Arden," but this story of William G. Raines, while it has all the pathetic features of the poem, surpasses it in thrilling incidents and adventures. Ten years ago Mr. Raines was a resident of our neighboring Village of Bandymoon, and was followed the occupation of a carpenter. He was married and had one child; but, thinking that he could better his fortunes, he left his family and sought employment in the East, expecting to return in a few months. During his absence he was engaged by his uncle to make a nine-months' cruise to Calcutta in a merchant vessel, on Good Hope. He wrote an affectionate letter to his wife, inclosing $200, informing her of his intended voyage and expressing the hope that upon his return they would be able to live happily together. The vessel sailed, and while in mid-ocean another letter was sent to his wife. After that, silence and oblivion. No word came from the lost man, and it was believed that the vessel had gone down with all on board. After waiting three years, and hoping against hope, Mrs. Raines at last concluded that her husband had found a watery grave, and, yielding to the solicitations of a new lover, she abandoned her widow's weeds and once more became a wife, marrying a Mr. Keble, who is now living over the hill on the National Road near St. Clairsville.

The third act opens with the unexpected return of Mr. Raines. The vessel was really wrecked on the west coast of Africa, north of Cape Town. Mr. Raines and his uncle, with four other men, succeeded in reaching shore in a boat, but were soon after captured by the natives. The prisoners were marched over into the interior. Each tribe took one of the men and kept him as a curiosity. Raines was divested of his clothing while on exhibition, and visitors came hundreds of miles to see the wonderful white man. He was the special property of the King, and was regarded with distinction by the whole tribe. But the prisoner pined for freedom, and hoped that far beyond the limits of the rolling hills, so high that no man could climb them, was his home and child. Inspired by these thoughts, William Bey, aged fifteen, were drowned in the river at Grand Rapids, while bathing, on the 17th.

DURING a rain at Reed City, on the 17th, the house of Isaac Hoag was struck by lightning and badly shattered. Two little daughters of James Thomas, the proprietor, were also struck, one of them fatally. The clerk was also injured.

How Xenia Man Can Be.

"Speaking of gall," remarked an Eastern printer, last evening, in a C street beer saloon, "talking of solid cheek, I never saw a man who had more of it than Pete Bivens, of Xenia City. Three of us used to room together there, in 1872. One night in July—it was so hot that if you'd chuck water on the side of a house it would size like so much hot iron—we couldn't climbed to go down and sleep on one of timber-rafts on the river. Well, we got on the raft with our blankets. Just before turning in, Pete Bivens said he guessed he'd cool off by taking a swim. I knew the current would snatch him right under, but he didn't want to give him any advice, and he dived off the end of the raft. The under-tow caught and sent him out of sight in about three seconds. As soon as we saw that he was drowned, me and the other chap went for his effects. We found $8.50 in his pants pocket and an old watch. We took 'em up town and souked the clothes for $2 and sold the watch for $12. Then we went round the town for a sort of a jamboree and spent the money. About five o'clock in the morning we were drinking up the last dollar with some of the boys, at the Blue Corner, when who should walk in but Pete Bivens. He had on old suit of clothes that he'd borrowed of a man three miles down the river. And long me if he didn't demand his clothes, and the next day he was 'round dunning us for the pantry $8.50. The gall of some men's enough to paralyze a Louisiana alligator."—Virginia (Nev.) Chronicle.

ON BROADWAY.

See! Young America, his active arms
With bundles laden,
Encircling to a stipulated kind of way
A pretty maiden.
Offer, she drops a card or two behind
Before he's missed her,
Ah! her confusion is plain—
He sees her.

And close behind the couple we have seen
Appears another—
A young man with a venerable dame—
Of course, his mother.
For in his walk a patronizing air
To her ear echoed.
And tells her things of which she was aware
Ere he circled.

Another pair, who walking far apart,
Seem conversation.
He eyeing all the young and blooming girls
With admiration.
She, with a wary eye, and look leaden down
With quick inclination to see current,
These two are married.

One couple more—their hands are slyly
They seem devoted,
The glances of each other's eyes possess by
Are all emoted.
So bright above are—
These two are lovers!

GOOD-NIGHT.

God keep you safe, my little love,
Through the night!
God shield you from the harm of ill
And bless you with His light!
My heart is with you while I kneel to pray,
Good-night! God keep you in His care always.

Thick shadows creep like ghost about
I lose myself in tender dreams,
While through the night
The moon comes shining through the window
Into my room.
A sliver streak, dear love—and yet—
The night is long,
I say with smiling hearts the old fond prayer,
Good-night! Sweet dreams! God keep you, evermore,
Mary B. Higbee, in Chautauquan.

"HANG THE BABY."

"Then you won't go, Alice?"

"No, Herbert—I am sorry—but the baby—"

"Oh, hang the baby!" and Herbert flung out of the room, slamming the door behind him.

Alice sat looking at the door, growing whiter and whiter. Then she gave a heart-breaking cry, fell on her knees in the cradle, and, folding her face in her hands, sobbed bitterly.

She had looked forward so long to going to this particular party. It was given by Mrs. Montjoy, one of the leaders in society, and all who were eminent in politics, diplomacy or literature, or who were distinguished in the fashionable world, were sure to be there. She had been kept at home so much since baby had been born that she really felt the need of a little variety and relaxation. But baby had been threatened with croup a week ago, and the fond mother had not yet recovered from her fright. Baby, she admitted, was now better, "but then," she declared, to be left, at least with such a nurse, to look after it. Nurses are so careless, everybody had told her, even the best of them. So she felt it her duty to give up the party. She had not asked Herbert to give it up also, and even said there was no reason he should stay at home, but still, in her hearts of all hearts, she hoped he would.

"He said, 'hang the baby,' yes, he did, darling," she murmured, with indignant emphasis, as she bent over the little unconscious sleeper. "It was papa who said that, and he has gone to a brilliant party, with such thoughts of his wife and child! Did you come, dearest, to estrange us from each other?"

This swivel idea called for bitter sighs.

Herbert had said such beautiful things in her trusting young maidenhood. "Never should their lives run in separate channels, as those of some married people of their acquaintance did"—"never a coy accepted that did not make them one!"—never a barrier should rise between them!" And now to think that this wee babe, with its golden curls, this beautiful little helpless creature should part them as never strong hands could!

She pictured the gay assemblage, and her Herbert dancing with fair young girls, smiling on others, and leaving her to die of heart-break.

Her imagination, always too vivid, viewed him in his triumphs, until her misery took almost the form of madness.

"He didn't want me to go," she said; "he acted as if he didn't, and he pretended to throw all blame on dear, helpless baby."

Suddenly she heard the sound of carriage-wheels outside; they stopped at the door; the bell rang, and a fairy-like figure stood on the threshold of the room, in all the wistfulness of expectancy, with dimpling smiles and laughing eyes.

"Oh, Mabel!" cried Alice, starting to her feet with a glad cry. "This is indeed a surprise. I'm so glad you've come. My darling sister!"

Forthwith ensued a scene of rapturous welcome. Then the baby was exhibited, and one would not have dreamed that a bear had ever stained the cheek of the proud mother. Then the visitor's trunks were ordered to be carried up-stairs.

"But where's Herbert? In the study?" said Mabel at last.

"He's out—out, dear."

"Good! Don't be angry, because I'm glad, for we can have such a nice little chat. You didn't expect me."

"Of course I didn't."

"Well, I didn't think of coming, as you know, for a month yet. But I thought it would be so nice to surprise you."

"Oh! I'm so glad."

"And then Paul is coming," she said, blushing, "next week, to stay a month: he has business here, and he wanted me so badly to be here too. I declare," she said, laughing, "I'll have to marry him soon to get rid of him."

"Oh, Mabel! don't marry him unless you're certain you'll be happy!" cried Alice, hysterically. "Be sure, first, he won't go to parties, and be—be—true to him—baby," she sobbed.

"What is Herbert at a party?" queried Mabel, a little saltier.

"Yes, he is; and when I told him I couldn't go on account of baby, he said, 'hang the—baby!' Yes, you little angel, your own father said those awful words—and then he sl—slammed the door."

"He's a viper!" exclaimed Mabel, with sudden vehemence. "A nice way to treat a wife like you—a baby like that! But why couldn't you leave baby?"

"Because he was threatened with croup last night."

"But he's well enough now—stops deliciously. He'll not wake up all the night, perhaps. And the nurse would have taken good care of it."

"I should have been thinking of her, and all that."

"Oh, nonsense! You ought to have gone. But Herbert had no right to interfere in this business, that is his affair, and I should have told him so. Herbert, looking up from the face lying on the bed, and took her seat by the glowing fire.

"It won't do to let him get the upper hand. Ah! I have it. I've thought of a splendid plan! A charming, delightful little plot," and she clapped her hands in glee.

"Oh, Mabel, what is it?" and Alice slid down at her sister's feet, gazing in her face with expectant smiles. "What are you going to do?"

"I'm not going to do it. I shall stay with baby. You are going to the party."

"Mabel! impossible!"

"Quite possible. In fact it must be done. You must let Herbert see that you're pretty as ever, body and soul, as much admired. It is decided. You are to go to the party and play a part. Let me arrange the programme."

"But, Mabel! I haven't a dress prepared—or anything. I gave up going a week ago, you see, when baby was threatened with the croup."

"Pshaw! You shall wear one of mine, one of the most bewitching, bewildering of dresses, bought from my last allowance from Uncle Curtis. Only to see it will throw you into ecstasies. Worth never composed anything more lovely. I want to see it on you. Come, come, call your maid; I am all impatience. We'll shame our bad husband into good behavior, see if we don't. Now you little rebel, sister, mine. I'll stay at home and fancy myself mistress here and count your pictures, vases and pretty things, and catalogue your books, and be as much admitted, was now better, "but then ill," she declared, to be left, at least with such a nurse, to look after it. Nurses are so careless, everybody had told her, even the best of them. So she felt it her duty to give up the party. She had not asked Herbert to give it up also, and even said there was no reason he should stay at home, but still, in her hearts of all hearts, she hoped he would.

OUR RADIX LETTER.

New York, Aug. 2, 1878.

EDITOR SENTINEL:

There is a crying need in this city for a "Burglar's Blue Ribbon Total Abstinence Society," by which the condition of this class might be ameliorated, and the dangers of their arduous calling in some degree lessened. No one can fail to sympathize with the sorrows of their overworked profession, the members of which gain their daily bread through the laborious use of pistol and "jimmy" frequently exposed to the damp night air, the teeth of the vicious watch dog, the bullet of the reckless and quarrelsome householder, and the officious nerve destroying screech of the suddenly awaking fiend(s). To these perils, also the unobservant and purely theoretical writer on the subject might, perhaps, add another springing from the exhilarance of the police force. But this would be such an error as could only arise from a fundamental misapprehension of the nature of the force, at least in this city. The New York policeman is entirely harmless and inoffensive, except toward women and children. He fully recognizes that the burglar is a man and a brother, born "free and equal," in strict accordance with the provisions of the Constitution. He, therefore, feels it his duty to exercise toward the latter the largest spirit of toleration, and makes it a point never to interfere with him, if possible. Nothing short of a burglar's running violently into a policeman, or shooting at him will attract the latter's attention. Then, indeed, forbearance comes to be a virtue, and the blue coat, unless unusually long suffering, sometimes shoots back, generally taking care, however, to lodge his bullet in the person of some third party by way of avoiding accidents.

It may thus be seen that my enumeration of the ordinary risks of the cracksman's vocation was tolerably complete, but unfortunately, a new and extraordinary one has arisen, which seems to bound the immediate remuneration of the flowing bowl by the fraternity. And this was the way of it.

When those lucky folks with money go out of town for the summer, they lock up their houses and leave them as dainty tit-bits for the burglars, who deeply appreciative of the implied invitation, usually drop in occasionally during the summer, and gratefully remove such articles as they chance to need or fancy. Thus it was with a Mr. Sweezy, whose family have been for the past month or so cooling themselves by the sea sea waves, and who during this period has been in the habit of making bachelor visits to his deserted city mansion for the purpose, I presume, of seeing how rapidly his valuables disappeared. On his last tour of inspection Tuesday morning, Mr. Sweezy found the basement door off its hinges, and mounting to his own apartment discovered two men sprawled upon his own bed, both with their boots on and both snoring disgracefully. Scattered upon the floor way a very miscellaneous litter, comprising among other things, five large empty but still odorous champagne bottles. Mr. Sweezy took in the situation at a glance, and became instantly indignant at the flagrant breach both of hospitality and good manners of which his visitors had been guilty. Leaving a friend to watch the latter, he at once sallied forth, and meeting two policemen, succeeded in convincing them that they would be justified in apprehending burglars who had so far forgotten themselves as to get hopelessly drunk and go to bed with their boots on. The latter were, therefore, gently awakened, and, on recovering partial consciousness, requested the officers, in accents thick, to "open another bottle." This demand was, however, not complied with; but, on the contrary, the ribbonous burglars themselves were shaken up like a gin cocktail and marched off to the station house, whence they will emigrate to Sing Sing via the County Court room.

This is why I say there is need for a temperance crusade among the burglars, and Mr. John B. Gough is hereby respectfully invited to prepare a lecture especially suited to their needs.

RADIX

A scheme which if not entirely practicable is at least a reasonable and pleasant one to discuss this warm weather, is Prof. Schroeder's proposed balloon trip to Europe, a list which if its projector's plans are successful, will be attempted within a few weeks. Ever since the Graphic newspaper's memorable ball-oon flight, projects of this kind have been received by the public with pitying and incredulous contempt, and Schroeder's forms no exception to the rule. And yet this experienced aeronaut feels as certain of the success of his present undertaking as though no failures had preceded it. He claims to have discovered as the result of years of study and observation, that there are two elevated air currents, one above another, the lower of which is now continually from West to East and the upper one in the reverse direction. All he has to do is to raise his balloon to the one or the other by means of fans worked by a magnetic engine, and then slip quietly across the ocean in forty eight hours. He says that just as soon as he has made his trial trips, he is going to get up a company and build air ships enough to establish a regular service between the two continents, two a day starting from either side and carrying mails and passengers, thus defying sea sickness and reducing the swift ocean steamers to the despised level of slow freight boats. With he would complete his arrangement before the close of the Paris Exposition, so that those of us who are pressed for time could leave the office some breezy afternoon, whisk over to the Champ de Mars, send around the big diamond for an hour, and get back to tea.

Another cool and seasonable performance, much more sensible than rowing, wrestling or horse-racing under the broiling sun, was that accomplished one day this week by one Russell, an expert diver, who for a considerable wager walked a mile within five hours on the bottom of the East River. He wore a diving dress supplied with air by means of a pump and tube and walked the appointed distance over a course one-sixth of a mile long, stocked on the river's bed and here, by frequent, so the diver reports, by big blue fish, lobsters and crabs. He rather expected to fall in with a shark during his submarine stay, several of these monsters having lately been seen in the river, and therefore carried a big butcher's cleaver and a spear for protection, but neither of these weapons were needed. After the completion of his task the pedestrain was much exhausted, but having won his bet, quickly recovered, and is now ready to do it all over again for the same money.

A vivid reminder of the man whose lot it was to precipitate the panic of 1873 is afforded to us by the meeting this week of a committee of Jay Cooke's creditors to hear a report from the trustee of the estate and discuss plans for closing it up. Nothing definite was accomplished but it may be interesting to learn that the claims against the estate aggregate over $8,000,000, and that it has about $300,000 to manage it for five years. The dividend will be small.

THE INVESTIGATION.

THE LOUISIANA SUB-COMMITTEE.

On the 16th, A. J. Reynolds testified that he walked with Mrs. Jenks at Donaldsonville, in 1877, from Weber's house to the hotel. Mrs. Jenks asked him if he didn't think B. A. Weber had the Sherman letter on his person when killed. He had a conversation with B. A. Weber after the election, he told witness he was not going to make a contest.

John Clegg, of Lafayette Parish, Secretary of the Senate, testified that there was no indictment or official returns of Supervisor Vosburg's action by witness at Vosburg's request. Vosburg swore to them and brought them to New Orleans, where witness left with the clerk, throwing out three polls and giving the Republicans 600 more votes than the original statement.

J. W. Armistead (colored), of West Feliciana Parish, testified that he made affidavit before the Returning Board, and it was presented to the Custom-House; witness never read it, and now denies many of the statements made therein.

Andrew Dumas (colored), Republican, of West Feliciana, testified regarding the organization of Democratic colored clubs in the parish, believed from this fact the Democrats would carry the parish; the negroes committed no bad government, etc.; made affidavit in the Custom-House after the election; the affidavit was not read to him, and he did not know what was put to the paper. The affidavit being read by Mr. Stenger, witness denied most of the statements made therein, and said he did not sign the Genoa letter, never made such statements.

James H. Ward (colored), of West Feliciana, went to St. James Parish before election, and did not vote after the election; was subsequently sent to the city and make affidavit; they took him to the Custom-House, but asked him no questions; kept him there three days; then brought him up and paid him $5 for his services; knew him, but he didn't know what affidavit he signed; was told that he had to go with a white man and Weber was to give him $5 for his services; didn't ask Weber what he was to get; the affidavit was not read to him; the statements in it were not true; he signed it in the presence of Weber and Dumas, who were present when he signed it; he understood that in two days more he would be paid $5 more; he received $10 from Weber; Weber never told him what he was to get for the affidavit.

Sandy Ward (colored), of West Feliciana, testified that he went to the Custom-House; Weber asked him if he had voted; he told him he had; Weber told him to go with a white man and he would be paid $5; he went with Dumas; Weber was not present when he signed the affidavit; he received $10 from Weber; Weber told him he would be paid $5 more; he received $5 more from Weber; Weber never told him what he was to get for the affidavit; he signed it in the presence of Weber and Dumas; he understood that in two days more he would be paid $5 more; Dumas was present when he received the

The editor of the Port Hope (Ont.) Times, who was one of the Canadian Press Association excursionists who lately stopped at Charlevoix has this to say about our town:

"About five o'clock, tea was served, and the party allowed a couple of hours on shore, while the steamer took on wood, at Charlevoix, quite a brisk little place, with, we were informed, a good agricultural country around it and several Indian settlements. Our party wandered all over the village—bought more curiosities to encumber them, and spent their time very pleasantly. The village having three Orange Lodges, (!) a pic-nic had been held that day, and it looked somewhat like home to see so many moving about with their regalia on and colors flying at their button-hole. The place being all but isolated, and telegraph messages having to be repeated at so many points, no news from Canada had been received, but was anxiously looked for. In the course of our wanderings, we found the village boasted a very respectable newspaper, and the editor being absent two of our party left little items for him "set up" in a "stick," being the most either of them had set at one time in a number of years. As leaving time approached we "gathered" again "at the River," and found Mr. Smith, the editor of the Sentinel, whose office we had just visited, waiting to see us. We found him a live, enterprising fellow, and we were only sorry his business engagements prevented him from going on to Chicago with us."

A letter has been received at New York from Frederick Bent, the cornet soloist of Gilmore's band, stating that the party met with very hard luck in Germany, and has disbanded for want of funds. In England and Ireland the band did fairly, but its business in France and Germany was very poor. To add to their troubles, their advance agent, who was sent to Germany to advertise their coming, ran off with $500, and they arrived in the fatherland utterly unheralded. The men have not been paid their salaries, and are writing home for money with which to return.

A teacher asked one of her pupils "who was the strongest man" Jonah," he replied "because the whale could not hold him down after he had swallowed him. Mrs. Grant is growing very stout in her travels abroad. She weighs 174 pounds to the General's 168.

Mr. McCloskey, ex Bishop of the diocese of Michigan, sailed for Europe on Saturday, the 20th inst. To a reporter he said that he did not know how long he would be absent, nor where he would travel. It is quite probable that the fallen Bishop will never return to the scenes of his disgrace.

Mr. Barnum rakes in $20,000 a week, by his show. This shows that his show makes a good show, and that, at its close, as in its course, there will be a big show.

C. & R. are receiving goods by every boat, their stock is always fresh and prices reasonable.

The Secretary of the Treasury is in excellent spirits over the satisfactory and constantly improving financial situation and prospects. He confidently believes that the coming autumn will witness a revival of general trade and industry, and that a long season of prosperity will follow the resumption of specie payments, which is practically already accomplished. The only serious drawback to such an encouraging outlook is the senseless but mischievous agitation that is being kept up by the class of politicians who call themselves "Greenbackers."

The Marquis of Lorne, husband of the Princess Louise, of England, has been appointed Governor General of Canada. The new Governor is a young man of 33, is very popular, and will suited for his new and responsible position.

GENERAL Butler has made the important discovery that all the good men in the country belong to the national party. They are all anxious to reform the abuses that have crept into the government, but what they would do if they got in he is not prepared to say in regard to his own candidacy as the Presidential standard bearer of the political saints he is discretely silent

General News Summary.

DOMESTIC.

On the 23d, the Treasury Department made another call for 5-20 bonds of 1868. Amount, $5,000,000; interest to cease Oct. 25.

THE Agricultural Bureau at Washington states that the wool clip this year is 3 per cent. greater than that of 1877.

AT East St. Louis, on the evening of the 23d, a squad of Metropolitan Police and a party of Deputy-Marshals had an armed encounter in the public streets of that city, during which from fifty to 100 shots were fired and several persons seriously wounded. The Governor ordered the Belleville Guards to preserve order, and they reached the scene of the trouble a little before midnight.

ACCORDING to a Baker City (Ore.) telegram of the 24th, Gen. Howard's forces and Forsyth's command had effected a junction, and would next day pursue the fleeing hostiles, who were moving toward Malheur Agency.

A DECISION has recently been made by the Commissioner of the General Land Office relative to the Kansas Pacific Railroad lands. It is in favor of settlers who have pre-empted railroad lands remaining unsold at the end of the third year after the completion of that road. This decision affects the status of many thousand sales which have been made by the Kansas Pacific Railroad Companies, whose charters contained the same clause as that of the Kansas Pacific, providing that any of the granted lands remained unsold by the company at the expiration of those years from the completion of the road such lands should be subject to pre-emption entry at $1.25 an acre.

THE receipts of the Government from internal revenue for the year ending June 30, 1878, were $111,993,239.01, or $7,965,564.93 less than that of the preceding year.

A COURIER arrived at Baker City, Ore., on the 26th, with intelligence from Gen. Howard, to the effect that the Bannock and Piute Indians had separated. The latter were fleeing the country, while the latter were supposed to be making for their agency, for the purpose of surrendering. A silver City dispatch of same date says there were indications of hostiles returning in that direction.

IN Washington, on the morning of the 28th, the members of the organization known as the Independent Labor League of the District of Columbia initiated a strike, because of the refusal of the contractors to dig the foundation for the new building for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, to pay laborers more than seventy cents a day. The strikers drove the few men at work from the ground. The next day the police protected the laborers, and scattered the strikers, and subsequently arrested the leader, Isaac Cohen, who was released on promising to have his men disperse and to hold no more riotous meetings. He was again arrested while addressing a meeting, for the evening of the 28th, and locked up, and several other arrests were made on the morning of the 29th.

THE New York Times of the 25th ult. gives the particulars of a terrible crime, which had just been made public, but which was committed some months previous. It is alleged that a married lady of Akron, of great refinement and beauty, had been visiting friends in the interior of New York State, and when leaving for home took a drawing-room car on the New York Central Road for Albany. She was followed into the car by two villains, who were probably attracted by the valuable jewelry she wore, and when the conductor appeared they informed him that the lady was insane, and that they were her friends conveying her to the asylum at Utica. On arriving at that place they conveyed her from the cars, she swooning away at the time, took her to a disreputable house and robbed her and subjected her to the grossest indignity and outrage. When the facts arrived at Albany, her husband learned of his wife's alleged insanity, and immediately started for Utica on a special engine. He soon ascertained the whereabouts of his wife, and found her in a woeful condition, her mind being seriously injured by her terrible experience. Every effort has since been made, consistent with privacy, to discover the fiends, but so far without avail.

KNAPP, in last June, a Deputy United States Marshal, attended to bring Depuy to Genesee Indictment, attempted to arrest a man in Pickens County, S. C., on a charge of illicitly distilling whisky. One of the friends of the accused made an altered forcible resistance to the officers, and was killed. The four men were bailed for murder. A conflict of authority grew out of the case between the State and Federal Courts, the State authorities contending for the sole jurisdiction of the State Courts. Judge Keedon has found or issued a writ of trasher to the United States Circuit Court. It was decided at Washington, on the 25th, to hold upon the transfer of the case to the latter court, and measures would be taken accordingly.

ON the 27th, the President of the Board of Health, of New Orleans, reported that the yellow fever prevailed in that city to such an extent that it would not be proper to have other bills of health, and thereby leaving that port. Up to noon, on that day, the total cases reported were eighty, and the deaths thirty-three. Quarantine had been established at most of the ports on the Mississippi below Cairo.

THE conditions were very favorable for the astronomical observations of the eclipse of the sun, on the 29th, especially on the line of totality in the Western States and Territories. Prof. Colbert, of the Chicago Astronomical Society, reports that his observations at Denver tend to show that the moon's path in the heavens has a little farther to the southward than indicated by the lunar tables, or else that the estimate of the moon's diameter is too large—perhaps both. The duration there of the totality was two minutes, forty and one-half seconds—three-and-one-half seconds less than the computed time. The measures made by Mr. Easterday indicated that the corona extended out, on an average, about twenty-five minutes of arc, corresponding to a distance of fully 700,000 miles, all around the sun. The chromosphere was distinctly seen by Prof. Hough, indicating a thickness of some 2,000 miles. The protuberances were much less prominent than at most of the recent eclipses. The scarcity of red hues tends to confirm the theory of connection with sun-spots, this present time being near the minimum of sun-spots. No signs of Vulcan were discovered by any of the parties at Denver. Prof. Watson, of Ann Arbor, Mich., was at Separation, Wyo. Ter., and discovered an intra-Mercurial planet of the size of a four and a half-minutiate star, about two and a half degrees southward of the sun. Mr. Lockyer, who was with Prof. Watson, says the corona was ten times brighter than in 1871, showing a great variation of such brightness between maximum and minimum period of sun-spots. On this occasion the corona vanished instantly, while in 1871 it remained visible for several minutes after totality. Edison's experiments at Rawlins with the instrument are said to have been quite satisfactory. The observations at Fort Worth, Tex., were a perfect success. Several photographs of the eclipse were taken in different localities.

PERSONAL AND POLITICAL.

THE National Greenback Labor party of Ohio met in State Convention at Columbus, on the 25th, and adopted a platform reaffirming the Toledo declaration of principles, and denouncing as serious against the people the financial legislation of Congress during the past few years; demanding that the Government shall issue a full legal-tender paper money; the withdrawal of all National bank notes; the issuance of agricultural income bonds; the repeal of the Resumption act; the unlimited coinage of gold and silver; the abolishment and prohibition of all legalized monopolies; denouncing alike the Communism which descends as equal division of property and the infamous financial legislation which takes all from the many to enrich the few; favoring the establishment of Bureau of Statistics and the employment of competent persons to inquire into and report the condition and wages of the working classes in all the departments of industry; opposing any further issue of interest-bearing bonds; depreciating all violent measures, and invoking the people to redress their cruel wrongs only through the ballot-box. Andrew Roy was nominated for Secretary of State, Chilton A. White for Judge of the Supreme Court and J. R. Fallis for Member of the Board of Public Works.

A platform was adopted similar to that of the Ohio Nationals. The name "National Greenback Labor Party" was agreed to. Among the resolutions adopted was one declaring it to be the duty of the State Legislature to limit the growth of rail road monopolies, and one favoring a protective tariff and the prohibition of the importation of all manufactured articles of which the raw materials are produced and labor to manufacture the same is found in this country. Gideon J. Tucker was nominated for Judge of the Court of Appeals.

ANNOUNCEMENT was made, on the 28th, that J. B. McClicker, the well-known theatrical manager, of Chicago, had filed a voluntary petition in bankruptcy. The total liabilities, including this judgment, are $650,000.

Sprinkling the Streets.

MR. Trevelyan, who lives on Court street, has had trouble already, with his garden-hose. Since the introduction of the Holly Water system, it has been the delight of Mr. Trevelyan to turn himself into a rainbow at sunset, and with his garden-hose sprinkle the thirsty street with the clear, cool water of the mighty Mississippi. Miss Norah Donavan, a young lady who is connected with the culinary department of Mr. Trevelyan's house, and is an impertinent of dormitories and general overseer of carpets, had often watched, as her duties would permit, this process of cooling down the streets at even-tide, and she had been heard to wish that this duty might be entrusted to her. She finally framed her wish in a direct petition, and last evening she entered upon the active duties of her new office.

When Miss Donavan took the nozzle from the hands of her master, it was pointed almost directly at the middle of the street, and Miss Donavan conscientiously retained it in this position, while her whole frame was convulsed with delight. Presently there came dashing down the street, in a light, open phaeton, two happy young people. In vain the male young person shouted, "Hi, there, I say, turn her off!" and in vain the female young person shrieked and essayed to hide behind a parasol no larger than a water lily. Miss Donavan only stared at them and wondered if peradventure they might be crazy, and when they passed through the torrent they came out on the other side, very sad, very silent and very damp, not to say limp. Then the gentleman shook his head and came out and called to her as he approached, intending to instruct her how to shut off the deluging stream or turn it aside when anyone came near. But Miss Donavan, hearing him call her name, said, "Sor?" and turned about and faced him with the morale doing its level best, while open and a fire pressure on. He turned with the first shot and fled for his own door, the cooling stream following him every inch of the way, like an angel of mercy in disguise. But by the time he reached his own door, he was so thoroughly drenched that his suspenders mildewed. Then a North Hill street car came rattling down, an open, summer car, just crowded with people coming in from a picnic at Sunnyside, and when they heard the driver shout, and then dodge, and then swear, they saw their fate and Miss Donavan, and just howled, and wailed, and screamed, and tried to get behind each other, and crept under the seats, and some of them even jumped off the car, and all of them, by their frantic gestures, wild shrieks and singular behavior, impressed Miss Donavan with the idea that they were drenched fully drank. The street car passed on, and when it was beyond the limit of Mr. Trevelyan's garden, the dryest man in that car could have put out a conflagration by simply leaning back against the frame that was burning, and before the car reached the next corner there were four well-defined spots for dues, I hope we shall have to some day, but a stray vine here and there seems hardly worth fussing over when we can't have the whole done."

Nellie sighed, but was silent, and presently Tim came in with an armful of wood.

"Nellie," he said, pausing near her table, "if you'd just sew this sleeve up a little. The old thing tears awful easy, and I just left it against a nail."

He spoke low, but Mrs. Barney's quick ears caught the words.

"That jacket torn again, Tim! I never saw such a boy to tear things to pieces! No, Nealie can't stop to mend it now, and I can't either. I've been intending to get you a new one, and that there doesn't seem much chance to make anything new while you contrive to make so much patching and darning on the old."

Mrs. Barney shut the door with a snap. Tim was the hired boy, kind-hearted but careless, and he was rather discouraging. Board and cushing sometimes appeared to her a high price for his services. "Hurry now, and pick some currants for dinner," she said.

Tim took the tin pail pointed out to him, but did not hurry as he passed with clouded face through the room. The thought of a new jacket would have been pleasant a few minutes before, but it had suddenly lost its attractiveness.

A Marriage That Didn't Come Off.

A young man on Minnesota street and one of the lady teachers in one of the public schools not far from Case avenue, having council died that a consolidation of their joys and sorrows would lead to their mutual advantage, resolved that upon the 17th day of July, 1878, at eight o'clock in the evening, they would be joined in holy wedlock. All the arrangements usually called for by a wedding were made, even to the securing of berths in a sleeping car for an eastern trip. The minister and the awful hour of eight p. m. arrived. The couple, with beating hearts and new clothes, presented themselves for the ceremony which was to unite two loving hearts and give him the privilege of paying for her clothes, and her the right to go through his pockets for other women's letters. Then the minister asked to see the license. The young man said he had no license. The preacher said he couldn't marry them without a license. The young man didn't know that license was necessary. He begged the minister to go on. The minister respected the young people of New Haven refused. The bride burst into very unschool-marmish tears, was sobbed and prayed the hard-hearted clergyman to look upon that wedding until she could complete the journey. The would-be bridegroom thought of the secured berths in the Wagner and endeavored to get up speed. Total words. 'Twas vain! The man of prayers refused to lay himself liable to six months in the Workhouse, and would do naught but marry a licensed house. Then the bridegroom proposed to go to Judge Tilden, and if he would say it was all right, would that not marry them? He would. Then the young man hustled around, and ran to the nearest tinshop to borrow a directory to find the residence of Judge Tilden. Thence he hastened to the Judge's house, tearing the wedding gussie in expectancy. An hour elapsed. The bridegroom returned: the bride rushed to meet him; the minister cleared his throat: the guests rose in expectation. With a regular air he sank into a seat and mopped the sweat from his brow.

"What did he say?" all ejaculated and the bride in her sadness. Come again in the morning and I'll give you the best license in the house." Just as if a man could get married any time of day."

The bride was carried off by sympathizing friends, the bridegroom sank into the depths of gloomy reflections, the minister pulled his hat, furnished the text in the morning, then the sermon might have gone on from firstly to forty-seventhly without Mrs. Barney's noting, and it not been for the cellar stairs.

Mrs. Barney was hurried that day—she was in the habit of being hurried—and it was warm and uncomfortable in the close, shiny stove-heated kitchen, where she was hastening to and fro, and growing fretted and tired without slackening her speed. Nonie, standing at the ironing-table, was tired also.

"There's so much to do," she said, wearily. "I don't see why we need to do baking and ironing both in one day. It makes such a crowd, and we could have left one for the morrow."

"To-morrow will bring work enough of its own," answered Mrs. Barney, quickly. "Beside, if we should get this work all out of the way the first of the week, a whole day to rest in would be worth something."

"But then we shouldn't take it for resting just because it would be a whole day, and something else could be crowded into it," murmured Nealie, to whom one hour now looked very inviting and that possible day in the future very uncertain.

"Some vines would be so nice at this window, mother, I could plant them if you would let Tim dig a little spot out there."

"Yes, but if we ever get the house fixed up so she want it, you shall have shutters at that window."

"But we don't know when we can do that, and the vines would be so pretty now," urged Nealie.

"Pretty? Well, yes, if we had the whole yard trimmed and laid out as it should be. I hope we shall have in some day, but a stray vine here and there seems hardly worth fussing over when we can't have the whole done."

Nealie sighed, but was silent, and presently Tim came in with an armful of wood.

"Nealie," he said, pausing near her table, "if you'd just sew this sleeve up a little. The old thing tears awful easy, and I just left it against a nail."

He spoke low, but Mrs. Barney's quick ears caught the words.

"That jacket torn again, Tim! I never saw such a boy to tear things to pieces! No, Nealie can't stop to mend it now, and I can't either. I've been intending to get you a new one, and that there doesn't seem much chance to make anything new while you contrive to make so much patching and darning on the old."

Mrs. Barney shut the oven door with a snap. Tim was the hired boy, kind-hearted but careless, and he was rather discouraging. Board and cushing sometimes appeared to her a high price for his services. "Hurry now, and pick some currants for dinner," she said.

Tim took the tin pail pointed out to him, but did not hurry as he passed with clouded face through the room. The thought of a new jacket would have been pleasant a few minutes before, but it had suddenly lost its attractiveness.

GRANSIR.

A grand old man,
Built after the olden plan!
A muscular body, a massive head,
A mark to make the bravest dread,
A man to remember when met
With you might see him
By lack at his case
(Awake or asleep as you please),
While he skills, and he whews,
And I read him the news.

Who's killed today?"
He asks in his surliest way;
And what have they stolen this time, my lad?
The fossils they delve like beaver in pond—
Bad works, boy, bad—very bad!"
Then for that ludicrous perch of the eye
While the nose gets a skirt
To the other side
Where he pulls it and pushes,
Keeping up with the news.

A charge for!
When he begins, "I tell ye, sir—"
Towards a new order of modern talk;
Then the silence after his "sez,"
He's about to say, "I tell ye, sir,"
But he stops at his nose,
You may put it down
When you see that frown
And the dim spark in eyes unusually clever,
He's about to settle some subject forever.

He's so complete
From his head to his feet
Under and over as viable to keep
Those in sympathy with his every mood
He makes you laugh and he makes you weep,
He stops at nothing in your mind;
He softens the tough
And lavels the rough
As he sessons and smokes
And preaches and jokes.

His children and wife
Have gone to the better life;
But he says, "they've only the start—that's
And you never would think him bereft
He wears the calmest face on the farm,
And with a genuine stamp of love
Often declares he's "young as a lamb"
Still he smiles and he smokes
Between sermons and jokes.

A grand old man,
Built after the olden plan;
A muscular body, a massive head,
A man to rule the house he lives,
A man to remember when dead.
Years yet may he linger his cricks,
The precious old son of the soil!
And may I be the last
While he skills and he whews,
To listen or read him the news.

MRS. BARNEY'S SERMON.

Strangely enough the bi-ennial starts preached it—at least they contributed that very important part—the appliction. Sister Searls pulled the text and furnished the text in the morning, then the sermon might have gone on from firstly to forty-seventhly without Mrs. Barney's noting, and it not been for the cellar stairs.

Mrs. Barney was hurried that day—she was in the habit of being hurried—and it was warm and uncomfortable in the close, shiny stove-heated kitchen, where she was hastening to and fro, and growing fretted and tired without slackening her speed. Nonie, standing at the ironing-table, was tired also.

"There's so much to do," she said, wearily. "I don't see why we need to do baking and ironing both in one day. It makes such a crowd, and we could have left one for the morrow."

"To-morrow will bring work enough of its own," answered Mrs. Barney, quickly. "Beside, if we should get this work all out of the way the first of the week, a whole day to rest in would be worth something."

"But then we shouldn't take it for resting just because it would be a whole day, and something else could be crowded into it," murmured Nealie, to whom one hour now looked very inviting and that possible day in the future very uncertain.

"Some vines would be so nice at this window, mother, I could plant them if you would let Tim dig a little spot out there."

"Yes, but if we ever get the house fixed up so she want it, you shall have shutters at that window."

"But we don't know when we can do that, and the vines would be so pretty now," urged Nealie.

"Pretty? Well, yes, if we had the whole yard trimmed and laid out as it should be. I hope we shall have in some day, but a stray vine here and there seems hardly worth fussing over when we can't have the whole done."

Nealie sighed, but was silent, and presently Tim came in with an armful of wood.

"Nealie," he said, pausing near her table, "if you'd just sew this sleeve up a little. The old thing tears awful easy, and I just left it against a nail."

He spoke low, but Mrs. Barney's quick ears caught the words.

"That jacket torn again, Tim! I never saw such a boy to tear things to pieces! No, Nealie can't stop to mend it now, and I can't either. I've been intending to get you a new one, and that there doesn't seem much chance to make anything new while you contrive to make so much patching and darning on the old."

Mrs. Barney shut the oven door with a snap. Tim was the hired boy, kind-hearted but careless, and he was rather discouraging. Board and cushing sometimes appeared to her a high price for his services. "Hurry now, and pick some currants for dinner," she said.

Tim took the tin pail pointed out to him, but did not hurry as he passed with clouded face through the room. The thought of a new jacket would have been pleasant a few minutes before, but it had suddenly lost its attractiveness.

The hay drew his bushy brows into a scowl, and, as soon as he was out of sight of the house, threw himself upon the grass and began his currant-picking in a very leisurely style. Then it was that Sister Searls drove up in her rattling old buggy, with a horse that was as Tim said, "a reg'lar old revolutionary pensioner."

"If I can't have fine horses and carriages I can take a deal of comfort with these," was always Sister Searl's cheery comment upon her equipage. She had an errand at Mrs. Barney's and had stopped on her way to the village. A plump, rosy-faced little woman she was, not young, only that she belonged to the class of people who never grow old; neatly dressed, though it was but that old poplin made over, Mrs. Barney wondering a little that she should have taken the trouble, when she surely needed a new one.

"This room is too warm to ask anyone to sit in," she said, apologetically, plucking a chair for her caller just outside the door. "When we are able to have our sitting-room altered to suit us, I shall not have a stove here in summer."

"In the meanwhile you have this nice cool porch. What a pleasant place it is," said Sister Searls, admiringly.

"Yes, if one had time to enjoy it," answered Mrs. Barney, with an uneasy little laugh. "I'm so hurried, trying to get everything about the place in just the right order, that I don't have time."

"Take time, Sister Barney, take time!" said Mrs. Searls, smiling, but seriously. "Many of your troubles, as you have while you are working for something better. Don't crowd out any little pleasures you have to make room for some great pleasure that's farther off. You see," she added, blushing a little, as if her words needed excuse, "it's something I had to learn myself, years ago—never to trample on duties in a wild chase after the roses. The roses I haven't found, but the duties have been enough to make the path bright."

Mrs. Barney looked upon her in some perplexity, as she took her departure. She had listened with one half her mind on the loaves of bread in the oven, and the other half did not fully comprehend what had been said.

"Duties and roses! I don't see what my self-culture has to do with wanting a new kitchen! But there, I suppose ministers' wives, even if they are only country ministers' wives, learn to get most quickly and easily. When we have a summer-kitchen we can begin to live as other people do."

"If we don't all die of Methuselah," complained Master Tommy, in an undertone which was perfectly audible.

"Anyway, the chickens will be if we can't have any cooked till that time," said his juvenile sister, upon chicken-pie for dinner, had been grievously disappointed.

Warm and weary with the morning's work, the questions and suggestions fretted Mrs. Barney. She felt wounded silently after dinner. No one seemed to see that she cared as much for things nice and comfortable as did the others, she said to herself. She cared far more, indeed, since she was willing to do without much now, and work and plan for the sake of having things all that could be desired by-and-by. How many present comforts and conveniences she had foregone for that! Those very cellar stairs, toward whose dark tortuous steps she was tending, were an example; they could scarcely be more ill-built, or in a more inconvenient place. Mr. Barney had wanted to remove them; but she would not allow him to incur the expense because a second removal might be necessary when the house was thoroughly rearranged. No, she had preferred to submit to the discomfort all this time.

Too long a time it proved, for even while she meditated an insecure board slipped beneath her feet, plunging her down the narrow stairway against the tough stone wall, and then upon the hard floor of the cellar. One swift moment of terror, the crash of dishes that fell from her hands, a flash of excruciating pain, and then she knew nothing more. She did not hear Nealie's wild cry from the room above, nor see her husband's pale face as he lifted her in his arms.

When she returned to consciousness a strange voice—the physician's—was saying:

Slowly she opened her eyes upon many unfamiliar faces, wet cloths and bottles of arnica and camphor, and gradually she comprehended what had happened, and her own condition—not dangerously injured, but bruised and lamed, with a sprained ankle that would keep her a prisoner for many days at least. It was a sudden pause in her busy work—an enforced rest. She scarcely knew how to bear it for a moment, as she remembered all she had planned to do, until a second shuddering thought suggested that she might have left it all forever; unless she grew patient and thoughtful. Yet it seemed strange to be quietly lying on the lounge in the best room, the room that had been kept so carefully closed to preserve the furniture until an addition to the house should translate it into a back parlor; to watch through the open door only a section of it, while Nealie flitted to and fro in the kitchen beyond, spreading the table for tea.

How glad the children were that evening, and how thoughtful her husband was, coming to her side again and again to talk or read to her! They had not found much time for talking or reading together these late years, she felt sure. She had always been so busy when he was in the house. She had dreamed of a leisure time coming, though, when they should have many evenings like this, except the illness or accident coming to mar her plans, or of death suddenly ending them. But it flashed upon her many times during the long hours of that afternoon that she understood the meaning and the earnestness of Sister Searls' entreaty.

"Why its all kind of real nice and jolly—if you would hurt," declared Tommy, unable to express his enjoyment of the pretty room, and the unusual family gathering any more clearly.

Tears gathered in the mother's eyes, but she had found her clue and meant to follow it. She had ample time for thought in the days that followed, when she was only able to sew a little, now and then, or listen for Tim, or look over seeds for Nealie's vine-planting; and slowly but surely she learned her lesson, and brought it back to health and strength—to gain her life's greatest blessing as God sends his sunshine—day by day.—*Kate W. A Diplomatist's Dilemma.

The Deputy X— was recently elected for one of the richest departments in the Government, triumphing over a certain M. D—, who had been ignominiously defeated. The person who secured the victory of X— was none other than the cheated M. D—. Shortly after the election the uncle commuted suicide, and the clergy, who had always found in him a determined adversary, refused to allow him to be buried in consecrated ground. X— on hearing this was greatly troubled; he wished at all hazards to avoid the scandal of a civil interment. It occurred to him that the best thing he could do would be to get the doctor of the locality to sign a certificate to the effect that the deceased had long been non compos mentis. The doctor made no objection. X— took the certificate to the cure, who ordered the church doors to be thrown open, and M. D., senior, was buried in Christian ground. The will was then opened, and it was found that the defunct had left all his property to the Deputy X—; but the nephew is going to contest the validity of the instrument on the ground that his uncle was out of his mind when he signed it. The question is what will X— do? Will he let the millions slip through his fingers, or will he acknowledge the fraud to which he resorted in order to secure Christian burial for his protector.—Paris Figaro.

—A young Sacramento lady a year ago commenced using arsenic for her complexion and bleaching the hair. After a few months she began to complain of terrible headaches, and has finally been sent to Stockton a hopeless invalid.

INCIDENTS AND ACCIDENTS.

—The bite of a black spider caused the death of a Smithtown (Pa.) child, two years old, a few days ago.

—The sun caused a false alarm at New York, the other day, an automatic telegraph wire running under a skylight being so heated that the thunderbolt was effected as if by fire.

—Existing organ-grinders have no rights whatever in this country. One of them found it necessary, at Pottstown, Pa., the other day, to compel a woman to pay for the music she had listened to by pointing a pistol at her head.

—A boy named Crowley, an inmate of the New York Juvenile Asylum, dreamed the other night that he was struck by lightning and killed. He related the story at the breakfast table next morning. In less than an hour after, while playing ball, he was struck by the bat and killed instantly.

—Miss Ella Hilton, sitting on a porch at her home at Avondale, Ohio, on the 4th, suddenly fell dead, as was at first supposed, from apoplexy, but an examination of her body disclosed the fact that a bullet had entered her breast and passed out at her back, killing her instantly. It was not known where the shot came from.

—The Connecticuters are well known to be an ingenious and economical people. Unfinished houses are by law exempt from taxation—a circumstance of which a resident of Cos Cob has availed himself to leave his dwelling round his house and a window unfinished. In this condition he has occupied it for years, defying the bailiff to enter.

—The Scranton (Pa.) Republican of a recent date, says: "Recently there was quite a rivalry among the dealers in milk, and the result is a great reduction in prices. Five cents a quart seemed the standard figure, but even this was beaten by a dealer who started selling it for four cents, and established a regular route. He secured a brisk business, and among his customers was Mr. Fritz, the harness-maker, who bought a dollars' worth of tickets. A day or two after there was a commotion in the household. A lizard was seen swimming about in the milk-pitcher. The thought that somebody might have swallowed the reptile, which measured about an inch and a half in length, made the matter all the more exciting, and the milk was so speedily ordered out of the circumstance. It explained the presence of the reptile by the fact that he kept his milk-cans near the spring house, and the lizard went up and down the spring. Scientific men, learned men in the professions, have compelled us to drop the luscious strawberry in terror, by screaming out to us that it would give us the hydrophobia. They have made us heartsick with apprehension by showing that the tempting peach in our hands was reeking with the deadly prussic-acid. They have filled our ice-cream with poisonous impurities. They have forbidden us to drink water that has passed through iron pipes or lead pipes, or that has stood in a wooden vessel, or run in a cemented cistern, or rippled down the rock of the hillside, impregnated with heaven and chemistry only know what awful substances, until one restriction after another has made it the only safe way for a man to get a drink of water, for him to lie down on his back, open his mouth and wait for the shower. Science has kindly warned us of the death that lurks in the coffee cup. The cup that blesses the breakfast-table impairs the digestion. Large doses of it produce palpitation of the heart. It is adulterated with Venetian red and antique sesquioxide of iron. It has also warned us against the use of warm tea, bread and butter, meat, vegetables, fruit, grain, roots, berries, milk and similar articles of food. Singular enough, science has not yet assailed iced tea.*

But it will not do to permit people to enjoy this cool, delightful beverage, simply because its taste is grateful to the wearied system during this scorching weather. We must do our duty, though science may shriek from it, and the people may cry out against us. There is danger in iced tea, and if you would live long and well, shun the cooling cup. We have not the space to devote to an extended discussion of this matter, and can only cite a few instances from a long series of carefully made experiments, which cannot fail to carry conviction to the most incredulous mind.

On June 10th, of this year, John C. Hempstead, of West Hill, began to drink iced tea at dinner and supper. He kept up this practice for nearly three weeks, and then one day, going down the Dickson street steps, he slipped and fell, shaving the skin on both legs, and running a sliver into the ball of his thumb so far that it made his teeth ache when he pulled it out. His clothing was also considerably torn. When he went home that evening he learned that his oldest boy had been whipped at school for striking a pin as far through another boy as the head would let it go. He was warned to quit drinking iced tea, but he persisted in the practice and he is now sleeping in the valley, between West and North Hill, where he lives, and says he never felt so well in his life. But maybe he lies about it.

*Henry Esterfeldt, of Eighth street, drank iced tea regularly every summer for three years. He noticed that after drinking it about two months, his boots began to run over at the heel. He persisted, and one Sunday afternoon, while he was out driving, his horse ran

It is in favor of settlers who have pre-empted railroad lands which remained unsold at the end of the third year after the completion of that road. The decision affects the status of many thousand acres which have been made by the several Pacific Railroad Companies, whose charters contained the same clause as that of the Kansas Pacific, providing that if any of the granted lands remained unsold by the company at the expiration of three years from the completion of the road such lands should be subject to pre-emption entry at $1.25 an acre.

THE New York Times of the 28th ult. gives the particulars of a terrible crime, which had just been made public, but which was committed some months previous. It seems that a married lady of Boston, of great refinement and beauty, had been visiting friends in the latter of New York State, and when leaving for home took a drawing-room car on the New York Central Road for Albany. She was followed into the car by two villains, who were probably attracted by the valuable jewelry she wore, and when the conductor appeared they informed him that the lady was insane, and that they were her friends conveying her to the asylum at Utica. On arriving at that place they conveyed her from the cars, she swooning away at the time, took her to a disreputable house and robbed her and subjected her to the grossest indignity and outrage. When the train arrived at Albany, her husband learned of his wife's alleged insanity, and immediately started for Utica on a special engine. He soon ascertained the whereabouts of his wife, and found her in a woeful condition, her mind being seriously injured by her terrible experience. Every effort has since been made, consistent with privacy, to discover the fiends, but so far without avail.

Sprinkling the Streets.

MR. Treveylan, who lives on Court street, has had trouble already, with his garden-hose. Since the introduction of the Holly Water system, it has been the delight of Mr. Treveylan to turn himself into a pipeman at sunset, and with his garden-hose sprinkle the thirsty street while the clear, cool waters of the mighty Mississippi. Miss Norah Donavan, a young lady who is connected with the culinary department of Mr. Treveylan's house, and is an superintendent of dormitories and general overseer of carpets, had often watched, as her duties would permit, this process of cooling down the streets at even-tide, and she had been heard to wish that this enjoyment be entrusted to her. She finally framed her wish in a direct petition, and last evening she entered upon the active duties of her new office.

When Miss Donavan took the nozzle from the hands of her master, it was pointed almost directly at the middle of the street, and Miss Donavan conscientiously retained it in this position, while her whole frame was convulsed with delight. Presently Annie Carey, dashing down the street, in a light, open phaeton, two happy young people. In vain the male young person shouted, "Hi, there, I say, turn her off!" and in vain the female young person shrieked and essayed to hide behind the dasher. Longer than a water lily. Miss Donavan only stared at them and wondered if peradventure they might be scrapy, and when they passed out of the range of the stream, out on the other side, very sad, very silent and very damp, not to say limp. Then the gentleman who drives next door came out and called to her as he approached, intending to instruct her how to shut off the deluging stream or turn it aside when anyone approached. But Miss Donovan, hearing him call her name, said, "Sorr?" and turned about and faced him with the nozzle doing its level best, wide open and a fire pressure on. He turned with the first shot and fled for his own door, the cooling stream following him every inch of the way, like an angel of mercy in disguise. But by the time he reached his own door, he was so thoroughly drenched that his suspenders mildewed. Then a North Hill street car came rattling down, an open, summer car, just crowded with people coming in from a picnic at Sunnyside, and when they heard the driver shout, and then dodge, and then swear, they saw their fate and Miss Donovan, and just howled, and wailed, and screamed, and tried to get behind each other, and crept under the seats, and some of them even jumped off the car, and all of them, by their frantic gestures, wild shrieks and singular behavior, impressed Miss Donovan with the idea that they were dreadfully drunk. The street car passed on, and when it was beyond the line of fire Mr. Treveylan's garden around the dryest man in that car could have put out a conflagration by simply leaning back against the house that was burning, and before the car reached the next corner there were four well-defined suits for damages fixed up against Mr. Treveylan.

By this time, Miss Donavan was pretty thoroughly convinced that the insignificant boy Agarbin house required final brand judgment and liberal education, and shrewd insight into men and motives, that belong only to the aristocratic classes, and she determined to resign her position forthwith. She went into the hall, carrying the nozzle with her, and spreading desolation and dismay wherever she went. "Whist!" she shouted, as the torrent drenched the hat-rack. "Mother!" she howled, when it knocked the globe off the hall lamp. "Misther Threveylan!" she shrieked, "where on the wide world is the shtopper?" and then she bent over the irrepressible nozzle and essayed to stop it with her finger. The howl of dismay that followed this attempt brought the startled family up into the hall, and in less than three minutes every seat in the house was taken, standing room all gone, and the play declared a success.—Burlington Hawk-Eye.

A Marriage That Didn't Come Off.

A young man on Minnesota street and one of the lady teachers in one of the public schools met far from Case avenue, having concluded that a consolidation of their joys and sorrows would lend to their mutual advantage, resolved that upon the 17th day of July, 1878, at eight o'clock in the evening, they would be joined in holy wedlock. All the arrangements usually called for by a wedding were made, even to the securing of berths in a sleeping car for an eastern trip. The minister and the awful hour of eight p. m. arrived. The couple, with beaming hearts and new clothes, presented themselves for the ceremony which was to unite two loving hearts and give him the privilege of paying for her clothes, and her the right to go through his pockets for other women's letters. Then the minister asked to see the license. The young man said he had no license. The preacher said he couldn't marry them without a license. The young man didn't know that license was necessary. He begged the minister to go on. The minister suggested the majesty of the law and refused. The bride burst into very unschool-marmish tears; she sobbed and prayed the hard-hearted clergyman to look upon their wedding outfit and complete the ceremony. The would-be bridegroom thought of the enormous depths in the wagner and entreated him to speak the fatal words. 'Twas vain! The man of prayers refused to lay himself liable to six months in the Work-house, the bridegroom to a night without the license. Then the bridegroom proposed to go to Judge Tilden, and if he would say it was all right, would the minister marry them? He would. Then the young man hustled around, and ran to the nearest theshop where a directory to find the residence of Judge Tilden. Thence he hastened to the Judge's house, leaving the wedding guests in expectancy. An hour elapsed. The bridegroom returned, the bride rushed to meet him; the minister cleared his throat; the guests rose in expectation. With a dejected air he sank into a seat and mopped the sweat from his brow.

"What did he say?" all ejaculated anxiously. "He said: 'Come around in the morning and I'll give you the best license in the house.' Just as if a man could get married any time of day."

The bride was carried off by sympathizing friends, the bridegroom sank into depths of gloomy reflections, the minister pulled his hat over his ear and went home, and the 10:30 train pulled out of the Union Depot with two less passengers than the schedule called for.—Cleveland Herald.

—It seems that Speaker Randall is one of the largest landowners in the United States, if a correspondent of the World is not mistaken. Writing about the title to the West Virginia land sold in this city a few days ago, he says: "Mr. Swann, a Massachusetts capitalist, lent large sums of money to Virginia during the Revolutionary War. He received in liquidation of the State's indebtedness to him a great land grant, which he located in Southwestern Virginia and in Eastern Kentucky. These lands lie partly within the boundaries of McDowell County, and of the original survey of that now county is the State of West Virginia is no estate of 1,300,000 acres, belonging not to an obscure and unknown person such as the vendee in the late timber sale in New York, who only acquired his assumed title in April of this present year, but to no less distinguished a gentleman than Mr. Samuel J. Randall, the speaker of the present House of Representatives."

GRANSIR.

A muscular look, a massive head
A mark to-day he no longer be here,
A man to wonder when dead.
A ship to-night see him,
Sat back at his ease
Awake or asleep, as you please,
While he shall, and he where
And I read him the news.

Who's kilted to-day?
He asks in his ancient way.
And what have they stole this time, my lad?
The rascals, they have take' pantry in pose
Bad works, boy, bad—very bad!
Then to that indicates perch of the eye
While the pain gets a slide
To the other side,
Where he pulls it and ponder
Keeping up with the news.

A chance for!
Then he begins: "I tell ye, sir!"
"Tis worth a whole book of your modern talk;
Then the silence after his "say."
That echoes and echoes down the ages
Is the silence of the true.
Who can put it down,
Who can say we that from
He's about to settle some subject forever.

He's no exercise
From his head to his feet,
Inside and out on to Chicago!
There's no one before before the rest;
He makes you laugh and he makes you weep,
He sets you to thinking
And you never quit
He softens the tough
And hoists the rough
As he assumes bad mistakes
And promotes the good.

A grand old man,
Built after the olden plan;
A noble old body, a generous head,
A man to wake he longer be here,
A man to remember when dead.
Years yet may be limber his ranks,
The perfect old son of the earth!
And may I be the last
While he whirls and he views,
To fasten or read him the news.

MRS. BARNEY'S SERMON.

Strangely enough the cellar-stairs preached it—at least they contributed that very important part—the application. On the Friday evening the text in the morning, then the sermon might have gone on from firstly to forty-secondly without Mrs. Barney's notice, had it not been for the cellar stairs.

Mrs. Barney was hurried that day—she was always hurried—and it was warm and uncomfortable in the sunshiny stove-heated kitchen, where she was hustling to and fro, and growing fretted and tired without knowing the speed. Neslie, standing at the ironing-table, was tired also.

"There's so much to do," she said, wearily. "I don't see why we need to do baking and ironing both in one day. It makes such a crowd, and we could have left either for to-morrow."

"To-morrow will bring work enough of its own," answered Mrs. Barney, quickly. "And if we should get the work all out of the way the first of the week, a whole day to rest in would be worth something."

"But then we shouldn't take it for resting just because it would be a whole day, and something else could be crowded into it," murmured Neslie, to whom one hour now looked very inviting and that possible day to the future very uncertain.

The mother did not answer and the young girl's hand moved more slowly over the damp muslins as her gaze wandered away to the hills where great trees were throwing cool shadows. How pleasant the shade and greenness would be! Her desire to bring it nearer suggested another thought to Neslie. "Some vines would be so nice at this window, mother, I could plant them if you would let Tim dig a little spot out there."

"Yes, but if we ever get the house fixed up as we want it, we shall have slantings enough for shadow," she said.

"But we don't know when we can do that, and it does look so pretty now," urged Neslie, pleadingly.

"Pretty? Well, yes, if we had the whole yard trimmed and laid out as it should be. I hope we shall have it some day; but a dreary vine here and there seems hardly worth fussing over when we can't have the whole done."

Neslie sighed, but was silent. Presently Tim came in with an armful of wood.

"Neslie," he said, pausing near her table, "if you'd just sew this sleeve up a little. The old thing tears awful easy, and I just hit it against a nail."

He spoke low, but Mrs. Barney's quick ears caught the words.

"That jacket torn again, Tim! I never saw such a boy to tear things to pieces! No, Neslie can't stop to mend it now, and I can't either. I've been intending to get you a new one, but there doesn't seem much chance to make anything new while you contrive to make so much patching and darning on the old."

Mrs. Barney shut the oven door with a snap. Tim was the hired boy, kind-hearted but careless, and he was rather discouraging. Board and clothing sometimes appeared to her a high price for his services. "Hurry now, and pick some currants for dinner," she said.

Tim took the tin-pail pointed out to him, but did not hurry as he passed with clouded face down the walk. The thought of a new jacket would have been pleasant a few minutes before, but it had suddenly lost its attractiveness. The boy drew his bushy brows into a scowl, and, as soon as he was out of sight of the house, threw himself upon the grass and began his currant-picking in a very leisurely style. Then it was that Sister Searls drove up in her rattling old buggy, with a horse that was, as Tim said, "a reg'lar old revolutionary prisoner."

"If I can't have fine horses and carriages I can take a deal of comfort with these," was always Sister Searl's cheery comment upon her equipage. She had an errand at Mrs. Barney's and had stopped on her way to the village. A plump, rosy-faced little woman she was, not young, only that she belonged to the class of people who never grow old; neatly dressed, though it was but that old poplin made over, Mrs. Barney wondering a little that she should have taken the trouble, when she surely needed a new one.

"This room is too warm to ask anyone to sit in," she said, apologetically, placing a chair for her caller just outside the door. "When we are able to have the house altered to suit us, I shall not have a stove here in summer."

"In the meanwhile you have this nice shade," said Sister Searls, admiringly.

"Yes, if one had time to enjoy it," answered Mrs. Barney, with an uneasy little laugh. "I'm so hurried, trying to get everything about the place in just the right order, that I don't have time."

"Take time, Sister Barney, take time!" said Mrs. Searls, smiling, but earnestly. "Make the most of what you have while you are working for something better. Don't crowd out any little sweetness you have to make room for some great pleasure that's further off. You see," she added, blushing a little as if her words needed excuse, "it's something I had to learn myself, years ago—never to trample on dinner in a cold chase after the roses. The roses I haven't found, but the dishes have been enough to make the path bright."

Mrs. Barney looked upon her in some perplexity, as she took her departure. She had listened with one half her mind on the leaves of bread in the oven, and the other half did not fully comprehend what had been said.

"Dishes and roses! I don't see what any sort of a flower has to do with wanting a new kitchen! But there! I suppose ministers' wives, even if they are only country parsons' wives, have so much talk that it comes natural to them. Dear me! I don't get much time for poetry in my life! I'm sure of that. How Tim does loiter!"

Tim, meanwhile, had sauntered out from among the bushes, and was engaged in satisfying the old horse that Mrs. Searls had fastened as securely as if it could be induced made any circumstances. Then he moved to this sort of gallantry, partly because he really liked the cheery little woman, and partly because he heard Mrs. Barney call, and was in no haste to go to the house.

"That will do, thank you, Tim," said Mrs. Searls, anxious to expedite his steps in the way of obedience. "I think Mrs. Barney is calling you."

"Yes'm; she most always is," answered Tim, philosophically, pausing to arrange the harness with painful deliberation.

"But, my dear boy," urged Sister Searls, reading something in the knitted brows, "you really should try to please her and help her all you can, you know. She is kind to you."

"Oh yes, she's kind! Only when I see one of her kindnesses a coming I dodge; it generally hits a fellow hard enough to be uncomfortable," responded Tim. Then, having relieved his feelings by this statement, his conscience pricked him slightly, and he added: "You see she's always in such a hurry. She can't come and bring 'em; she has to pitch 'em."

Mrs. Searls meditated as she drove down the country road.

"Well, I never thought of that before, but I do suppose that's why the Bible speaks of the Lord's 'loving-kindness' and 'tender mercy'—because there's so much kindness in the world that isn't one bit loving, and so much mercy that is only duty and not tenderness. I'll tell Josiah that," for it happened that while the good minister pored over his books and studied theology, his wife, going here and there, studied humanity. And though he cooked his own sermons, his wife often seasoned them. This baking was done at last, the currants picked, and Mrs. Barney's dinner ready.

"For the bounty bestowed upon us may we be duly grateful," murmured Mr. Barney, with head bowed low over his plate. Then he looked up and remarked that he was tired of a steady diet of ham and eggs, and didn't see why they couldn't have a little variety.

"You would see if you had to cook in the hot kitchen, my dear," responded Mrs. Barney, more shortly than her wont. "I'm glad to have whatever I can get most quickly and easily. When we have a summer-kitchen we can begin to live as other people do."

"I've put off old as Methuselah," complained Master Tommy, in an undertone which was perfectly audible. "Anyway, the chickens will be if we can't have any cooked till that time."

He had applied the odors of the baking on his housewarm way from school, and, settling his juvenile mind upon chicken-pie for dinner, had been grievously disappointed.

Warm and weary with the morning's work, the emotions and suggestions fretted Mrs. Barney. She felt wounded and aggrieved, too, as she moved about, silently after dinner. No one seemed to see that she cared as much for things nice and comfortable as did the others, she said to herself. She cared far more, indeed, since she was willing to do without much now, and work and plan for the sake of having things all that could be desired hereafter. How many present comforts and conveniences she had foregone for that! Those very cellar stairs, toward whose dark tortuous steps she was tending, were an example; they could scarcely be more filthy-built, or in a more inconvenient place. Mr. Barney had wanted to remove them; but she would not allow him to lower the expense because a second removal might be necessary when the house was thoroughly rearranged. No, she had preferred to submit to the discomfort all this time.

Too long a time it proved, for even while she meditated an insecure board slipped beneath her foot, plunging her down the narrow stairway against the tough stone wall, and then upon the hard floor of the cellar. One swift moment of terror, the crash of dishes that fell from her hands, a flash of excruciating pain, and then she knew nothing more. She did not hear Neslie's wild cry from the room above, nor see her husband's pale face as he lifted her in his arms.

When she returned to consciousness a strange voice—the physician's—was saying:

"She is long broken, though it's a wonder her neck wasn't, falling in the way she did."

Slowly she opened her eyes upon a confused mingling of unseen faces, wet cloths and bottles of arnica and camphor, and gradually she comprehended what had happened, and her own condition—not dangerously injured, but bruised and sore lamed, with a sprained ankle that would keep her a prisoner for many days at least. It was a sudden pause in her busy work—an enforced rest. She scarcely knew how to bear it for a moment, as she remembered all she had planned to do, until a second shuddering thought suggested that she might have left it all forever; then she grew mightily and thankful. Yet it seemed strange to be quietly lying on the lounge in the best room, the room that had been kept so carefully closed to preserve its furniture until an addition to the house should transform it into a back parlor; to watch through the door only a spectator, while Neslie flitted to and fro in the kitchen beyond, spreading the table for tea.

How good the children were that evening, and how thoughtful her husband was, counting to her she again and again to talk or read to her! They had not found much time for talking or reading together these late years, she and her David; she had always been so busy when he was in the house. She had dreamed of a leisure time coming, though, when they should have many evenings like this, except the illness or accident coming to mar her plans, or of death suddenly ending them. Put it aside now how many loving words and offices and daily enjoyments had been crowded out of their home and in that brief retrospective glance she understood the meaning and the earnestness of Sister Searls' entreaty.

"Why its all kind or real nice and jolly—if you wasn't hurt," declared Tommy, unable to express his enjoyment of the pretty room, and the unusual family gathering any more clearly.

Tears gathered in the mother's eyes, but she had found her clue and meant to follow it. She had ample time for thought in the days that followed, when she was only able to sew a little, now and then, on garments for Tim, or look over seeds for Neslie's vine-planting; and slowly but surely she learned her lesson, and brought it back to health with her—to gather life's pleasantness as God sends his sunshine—day by day.—*Kate W. INCIDENTS AND ACCIDENTS.

—The bite of a black spider caused the death of a Norristown (Pa.) child, two years old, a few days ago.

—The sun caused a false alarm at New York, the other day, an automatic telegraph wire running under a skylight being so heated that the thermometer was affected as if by fire.

—Evidently organ-grinders have no rights whatever in this country. One of them found it necessary, at Pottstown, Pa., the other day, to compel a woman to pay for the music she had listened to by pointing a pistol at her head.

—A boy named Crowley, an inmate of the New York Juvenile Asylum, dreamed the other night that he was struck by lightning and killed. He related the story at the breakfast table next morning. In less than an hour after, while playing ball, he was struck by the bat and killed instantly.

—Miss Lida Hutton, sitting on a porch at her home at Avondale, Ohio, on the 4th, suddenly fell dead, as was at first supposed, from paralysis. But an examination of her body disclosed the fact that a bullet had entered her breast and passed out at her back, killing her instantly. It was not known where the shot came from.

—The Connecticuters are well known to be an ingenious and economical people. Unfinished houses are by law exempt from taxation—a circumstance of which a resident of Cos Cob has availed himself to leave up the dwelling round his house and a window unfinished. In this condition he has escaped it for years, defying the baffled Tax-Collector.

—The Scranton (Pa.) Republican of a recent date, says: "Recently there was quite a rivalry among the dealers in milk, and the result is a great reduction in prices. Five cents a quart seemed the standard figure, but now this was beaten by a dealer who started selling it for four cents, and established a regular route. He secured a brisk business, and among his customers was Mr. Fritz, the harness-maker, who bought a dollars' worth of tickets. A day or two after there was a commotion in the household. A lizard was seen swimming about in the milk-pitcher. The thought that somebody might have swallowed the reptile, which was assured about an inch and a half in length, made the matter all the more exciting, and the milkman was speedily advised of the circumstance. He explained the presence of the reptile by the fact that he kept his milk-can near the spring for cleanliness, and the lizard was in it to get a drink of pure four-cent milk.

The Perils of Iced Tea.

Beware the cup. In these days of raging thermometers and busy Corporations it is fraught with peril. It amazes us, sometimes, to think how long the people of America have been permitted to go on dallying with this living death, unwarned by the monitions of science. It is seldom that scientific men have been so sinfully neglected as they have shown themselves to be in this matter of iced tea. They have been prompt enough to warn us of the poisonous qualities of everything else we like to eat and drink, until they have about blotted out everything fit to eat or drink from the tail of fare, and started us down to a bran-bread diet, and now comes along Dr. Holland, in Scribner for July, and assures us that the Grayan system of diet starves more New Englanders to death in six months than all four other causes in a year. Hereof the name of Dr. Holland for that statement. He doesn't put it quite so strongly as that, but that is the way we believe it. Scientific men, learned men in the professions, have compelled us to drop the luscious strawberry in terror, by screaming out to us that it would give us the hydrophobia. They have made us heartsick with apprehension by showing that the tempting peach in our hands was reeking with the deadly prussic-acid. They have filled our ice-cream with potent vos huporifics. They have forbidden us to drink water that has passed through iron pipes or lead pipes, or that has stood in a wooden vessel, or that is a connected charge, or distilled from the rock of the hillside, impregnated with heaven and chemistry only know what awful substances, until one restriction after another has made a the only safe way for a man to get a drink of water, for him to lie down on his back, open his mouth and wait for the sewer. Once has kindly warned us of the death that lurks in the coffee-cup. The cup that blesses the breakfast-table impairs the digestion. Large doses of it produce palpitation of the heart. It is adulterated with Venetian red and antique sesquioxide of iron. It has also warned us against the use of warm tea, bread and butter, meat, vegetables, fruit, grain, roots, berries, milk and similar articles of food. Singular enough, science has not yet assailed iced tea.

But it will not do to permit people to enjoy this cool, delightful beverage, simply because its taste is grateful to the wearied system during this scorching weather. We must do our duty, though science may shrink from it, and the people may cry out against us. There is danger in iced tea, and if you would live long and well, shun the cooling cup. We have not the space to devote to an extended dissension of the matter, and can only cite a few instances from a long series of carefully made experiments, which cannot fail to carry conviction to the most incredulous natures.

On June 16th, of this year, John C. Hempstead, of West Hill, began to drink iced tea at dinner and supper. He kept up this practice for nearly three weeks, and then one day, going down the Division street steps, he slipped and fell, abrading the skin on both legs,

OUR RADIX LETTER.

New York, Aug 9, 1878.

EDITOR SENTINEL:

That class of Americans to which I have occasionally referred as sighing after the titles and customs of European aristocracy, have had a titbit this week in the accounts of the marriage in London, on the 27th ult., of Miss Minnie Stevens, daughter of the late Paran Stevens, of this city, to "Arthur Henry Paget, lieutenant and captain of the Scots Fusilier Guards, eldest son of Lieut. General Lord Alfred Paget, Clerk Marshal of the Royal Household and fifth son of the first Marquis of Anglesey." Think of it! And as though it were not honor enough of itself for a daughter of this poor plebian republic, which can't even confer a knighthood, to marry all that, the occasion was rendered still more excruciating by the august presence of the Prince of Wales and four or five others of the royal blood. We have not yet had time to receive the mail containing the inevitable columns of spread eagle minutiæ, but a breathless and awe-struck cablegram has favored us with the points which were too important to keep. Thus we learn that not only was the future King of England there, but that he actually condescended to 'converse' with the bride, as did also his Gracious Niba the Duke of Connaught, that younger scion of royalty, who has just popped the question to a German princess, and been voted $50,000 a year for life by a grateful Parliament for so doing. Altogether this was a most refreshing season, and the accounts thereof will be a joy to the title-worshipers for months to come.

The wedding is also announced of Miss Arkansi, (an Albany, N. Y. girl) the well-known prima donna, to Mr. Ernest Gye, son of a famous operatic managers of London.

At a time when defaultings and business corruptions daily unearthed, a crowding succession of brutal crimes and a prevalence of low political huckstering combine to enforce a belief in the doctrine of human depravity, it is a genuine satisfaction to discover evidences that the better side of human nature does assert itself despite them all, and by works of delicate and disinterested charity proves that the capacity for self sacrifice and devotion has not been lost from among us. The winter months are those which call out the most frequent expressions of sympathy for the poor, but in New York, at least, the rigors of summer are even more deadly and tormenting to a large proportion of that class whom we have always with us. The sickening details of tenement life during the hottest weather have been printed so often that they are painfully familiar; and it is in mitigation of the suffering in these pest holes that some of the noblest and humane efforts of charitable New York are being expended. Hospitals for old and young are liberally and effectively managed, and what is more important a vast amount of sickness and consequent death are prevented by the work of physicians who, either as volunteers or as employes of individual or bodies, penetrate the very strongholds of disease and not only prescribe for the actually prostrate but by impressing upon the minds of the ignorant and often ungrateful inhabitants the simplest rules of hygiene, accomplish more by prevention than cure. Then there are the harbor excursions which are supported, this year at least, entirely by voluntary offerings and through which thousands of half suffocated women and children are given the chance to breathe in the pure sea breeze for a day and thereby to gain a new lease of life. Free dispensaries are also well kept up and supplies of healthful food are freely contributed.

Nor are the coarser needs of penniless humanity alone regarded. Boxes for the reception of newspapers and other reading matter are set up in depots and other public places, which are almost daily liberally filled by passers-by and whose contents are distributed among the hospital patients. There has also been established by some ladies a Flower Mission, as it is called, which collects contributions of fresh flowers during their season and gives them out in bouquets among the sick children and their weary mothers. To me this seems the most touching and beautiful of all the minor charities, and I am firmly convinced that it is by no means the least useful. To most of the recipients the sight of flowers is like an angel's visit not only for rarity, but for the pleasure it confers; and to the poor women, for instance, who come to the mission for medicine, and who in addition to this relief can carry home with her a little bunch of fresh and fragrant flowers, these last have often as much of healing as the physician's remedies. The flower mission has already distributed this season nearly 50,000 bouquets and something like 1,000 potted flowers.

Readers of New York papers may remember the short-lived excitement about this time last year by Jay Gould's being tossed over a railing into a wall street basement by a stalwart victim of one of his stock jobbing tricks. Now Mr. Gould is celebrating the anniversary of that little affair by getting himself into a more serious trouble. He has been for some weeks at the head of a drove of "bulls" who have been trying to force certain stocks up to fictitious quotations. Report now says that the job was too big for even the wily Jay to handle and that he is now in a very tight place financially. The king of the street however has as many lives as a cat, and I shall be greatly surprised if the predictions freely made of Gould's downfall are not entirely falsified within a few days.

The two most distinguished arrivals here this week were Said and Bachita, two baby hippopotami, who were captured in the Upper Nile region some months ago, and have have now come over here to replace the young hippopotamus who was for some time one of the chief attractions of the Aquarium, but who shuffled off his mortal coil last spring. The newcomers weigh about 300 pounds apiece, and are the only pair of these animals, male and female, now in captivity.

Our weather here has been run under the auspices of Jupiter Pluvius for a week past. Where all the rain comes from is beyond conjecture but roughly estimating from appearances I should say that about forty feet had fallen since my last writing. Over in that wicked city of Brooklyn they have been having their streets turned into creeks and their cellars to cisterns. No very heavy damage to property is reported.

THE INVESTIGATION.

On the 24th, Representative Kelley was examined, and detailed the circumstances attending his visit to New Orleans in 1876. He went there merely as a lookeron and saw that nothing improper occurred. He had talked with President Grant before he left. On arriving at New Orleans he found there Senator Sherman and other visiting statesmen and also a number of the leading citizens. After a consultation of the latter he addressed a communication to the Republican Returning Board, a duplicate of the letter to the Louisiana Returning Board, but the latter declined. Witness was satisfied from conversations with members of the Board, and never discussed the subject of the report of such interference. Attention being called to that portion of Weber's testimony wherein he stated that the Returning Board was influenced by the visiting statesmen to reject the returns, he said that Weber's testimony was unqualifiedly false. The general character of the evidence showed intimidation and some of it was most abhorrent. He heard the testimony of Elias Parkerson and believed it to be true. He testified falsely when the stage has had a brilliant armament. Witness had never heard of any suggestion to manipulate the parishes for any purpose, and never heard that brittons schedavis were used but never seen any. Witness did not know of Shea's having any conversation with Anderson and Weber.

Custard Parker, of New Jersey, testified that he was in New Orleans in the interest of Tilden and Hendricks; confirmed generally the testimony of Mr. Kelley.

Representative Hall said he went to New Orleans solely on the request of Mr. Kelley, and to assist the latter in one of their flights of a mysterious character. He knew nothing of any money that the visiting Republicans influenced the action of the Returning Board as to him. In reply to a question by Mr. Butler, Mr. Hale said that Kellogg talked to him in private in the presence of others, and had never offered him any reward for anything he had done or might do. As in relation to the appointment of sundry witnesses before the committee, Mr. Sherman said he would not hesitate to appoint any one as a witness, but would not have him duty, then. Butler asked in an examination of the case of Postmaster Parker of New Orleans, brother-in-law of Mr. Butler, but Sherman objected that he was not bound to reveal Cabinet secrets, and Hoar generally sustained the objection.

Gen. Garfield desired to show he came to go to New Orleans. He was in no more mischief to the D. A. Weber for information relative to the Packard-Wells business than to any one else. He thought it odd that the whole trouble was founded on the alleged decisions of the Democratic State Committee. He advised the formation of the club to show that there was physical as well as moral force on the side of Packard. He denied the truth of E. L. Weber's testimony in regard to the statements and action of the visiting Republicans. There was not a word of truth in his statement that they advised the Returning Board to stretch their powers to the utmost extent with a view to future Presidential votes. In answer to a question by Gen. Butler, Garfield said he believed Packard was elected Governor of Louisiana. Hoar, Butler and Garfield said the troops were called out to prevent a conflict between the two governors-elect and to prevent bloodshed and preserve the state's peace. In reply to a question by Mr. Butler, Garfield said he never saw Packard or Wells drink a drop of liquor. Witness had no knowledge of a reported turn out at Packard's house on the Wednesday after the election.

MR. STORER was recalled, on the 25th, and testified that he had seen Mr. Sherman's signature, and thought he could recognize it. He knew the letter shown him by Weber to be a forgery, as Sherman's handwriting. In reply to a question by Mr. Potter, witness stated that the signature of Sherman to the letter shown him by Weber was made until after election. The Democrats in Louisiana certainly stated the policy according to the New York plan—they bought votes.

Col. George Story testified that there was no bull-dozing in Madison Parish. He had heard of the Wickliffe case. Her affidavit was taken by Watts one of the visiting statesmen. She was made no inducements to tell an untruth, and to his knowledge she stated what she thought was the truth. The work of procuring evidence was left entirely to the committee, and was done under the supervision of the various statesmen. Wilson saw Jim Weber in New Orleans frequently. Witness declined to answer a question in regard to the answer of Dr. Ferguson, saying it was a question that deserved was his friend, and he was thus engaged in investigating the circumstances of the murderers with a view to the punishment of the murderers, and if he told what he knew the ends of justice might be defeated. Witness said the Republicans were greatly annoyed at first with Packard's nomination; he believed any other candidate would have brought out a much larger white vote in support of the ticket. Regarding the political manipulations in Louisiana, witness stated that under Gen. Kellogg or Warmoth no man dare think to be heard of any contention for murder, and the same was true of the Nicholls government up to the time Packard was born in the returning Board, and he believed it to be true. He testified falsely when he said he had a brilliant armament. Witness had never heard of any suggestion to manipulate the parishes for any purpose, and never heard that brittons schlavis were used but never seen any, and did not know of them. He was having any conversation with Anderson and Weber.

FILER FOR CONGRESS.

Dr. L. Filer, of Ludington, was of the opinion of that healthy way man-aged to make a one money in the lumber business—and so go to Congress. During the past fortnight, he met a few hostilities have been securing the lower Peninsula portion of the State district, industriously trying to work up enthusiasm for Filer, and "the things" for him. Mr Filer was an aspirant once before, when Mr. Hubbell was nominated the first time. Hon. Sam Moffatt, of Traverse City, was also candidate before the same convention. Mr Filer was chairman of the Congressional Committee that called that convention, and through some mysterious and delicate art, query, murdering it apportioning delegates, several new counties (which were known to favor Moffatt), were given but half a vote each. When a test of strength came in the convention the fact was developed that if those new counties had been given one full vote each, which they should have had, Mr. Moffatt would have been nominated After a protracted struggle, embracing some 30 or 36 ballots, Mr. Hubbell was nominated. After Mr. Hubbell had made a brief speech, accepting the nomination and expressing thanks for the same, the defeated aspirants—Messrs Moffatt, of Traverse City, Burt, of Marquette, Dr. Ellis, of Manistee, and Filer, of Ludington were successively called out. All except Mr. Filer expressed their acquiescence in the choice of the convention, and promised the ticket their cordial and hearty support. Mr Filer made no speech, but said the action of the convention put him in mind of a story; and then he refused a decidedly sanctity anecdote, which was not only in bad taste, disclosing a sad want of refinement in one who should presume to aspire to a seat in Congress but which would be construed in no other way than as exceedingly clumsy tomfoolery to the convention. Before adjournment, a resolution was adopted declaring that in all future conventions every organized county should be entitled to at least one delegate with one full vote. This was done to prevent a recurrence of the gerrymandering practiced by Filer's committee.

The PIONEER-MAGNET expressed a preference for the renomination of Mr. Hubbell some time ago, and that is our position to-day. While there may be scores of men in the District whose ability is equal to that of Mr Hubbell, they lack acquaintance at the National Capital, and are entirely wanting in that experience which enables Mr. Hubbell to work understandingly and effectively from the opening day of the session, and to accomplish more for his District and State than two new men could, be they ever so brilliant. In private business affairs, prudent and discreet managers employ those who are most competent and faithful in their performance of the particular work required and when they get such a man, they keep him as long as possible, instead of discharging him as soon as he thoroughly familiar with his duties, and employing another who has them all to learn. Mr. Hubbell's ability, force of character and extended experience, render him decidedly preferable to a new man, particular at this time unusual vigilance is necessary to guard the nation against the schemings and plottings of those but recently in open rebellion against the Government.

For any thing you want go to Sco & Washburn's.

The editor of the Traverse Bay Eagle in all his comments upon positions taken by the SENTINEL, has something to say regarding the Charlevoix Postoffice. The reason is obvious. Since 1868 there has been photographed upon the spectrum of Sprague's political eye, the outline of something closely resembling a Land office or Postoffice. After several hoarders after the reality he has finally been forced to content himself with this circular substitute As the loaves and fishes are the Alpha and Omega of his politics, so he thinks they are the beginning and ending of everybody else's Political creed. The SENTINEL proposes to rise above those considerations, and will always be found upon the right side, postoffice or no postoffice.

—A. V. Markham, a blacksmith from the southern part of the State, now occupies Mr. Porter's blacksmith shop.

—A Presbyterian Society was organized here on the 11th of this month.

GEORGE MILLER, of this place, is puffed up in the fullness of his pride. There appointed at his residence one day last week, an eight pound girl. George is loud in his praises of its hereditary goodness, beauty, etc., but persists in calling it "he."

PERSONAL.—M. Litcomb, of Flint, has been spending a few days with his son, S. S. Liscomb, of this place.

—R. W. Smith, of Ithtige fame, is at the Fountain City House.

—Episcopal service was held at the same church in the evening, Rev. Mr. Engle occupying the pulpit.

—Quarterly Meeting—the last in this conference year—will be held next Sabbath in the Methodist church.

THE LECTURES.—The lecture of Mrs. Boise Sunday evening, on the subject of temperance, was well attended. Charlevoix is the wrong town for temperance lectures, and little, or no interest was manifested.

—The lecture by Rev. F. E. Kittridge on "Luck and Pluck," on Tuesday evening, at the M. E. Church, is spoken of by nearly all who heard it as par excellence. It was full of fine thoughts, and delivered in a masterly manner.

THE Odd Fellows of Charlevoix have leased the upper portion of the store building belong to Mr. Francis, and intend to have it fitted up as a lodge room.

THE Western Union Telegraph Line terminates at Charlevoix. Thank God something terminates here, if it is not a railroad.

THE view of the Resort grounds from the village, and vice versa, is badly obstructed by a lot of worthless dead hemlock tree near the bayou, which should be cleaned out for the benefit of all concerned.

COLLINS the Charlevoix meat market will receive a lot of sheep this week, and our folks will be well supplied with mutton.

HON. Henry W. Lord, of the State Board of Commissioners of Penal, Pauper and Reformatory Institutions, formally inspected our jail Saturday.

THE gospel ship Glad Tidings, commanded by Rev. Capt. Bandy, came into port on Tuesday, and went up South Arm, where the Christian mariner has held up to this writing, several interesting meetings. Capt. Bunday was recently ordained a Congregational minister and has full powers to exercise the functions of a minister of the gospel.

A Danger Threatening.

On the 28th of this month the Republican Representative Convention meets in this place. Its duty will be to, select from among the few candidates for the office of Representative in the State Legislature a man who, by virtue of moral and political rectitude, will ensure victory. A word to the delegates who shall compose that Convention:

We wish to here record a warning against an impending danger to Republicanism in this District. We solemnly warn the Convention against demagoguery and "personal claims." We caution the Convention not to put in nomination a man whose personal and political record will not bear the closest scrutiny. We caution them against giving as a candidate whose profession and sympathies are not in full accord with the interests of the people of this District.

The Convention have it in their power to unwittingly elect a Democrat. Will they take this responsibility. A candidate unincumbered by any past political blunders, and possessing the political and business confidence of the Republican voters at the District is the only one that can be elected, under existing circumstances.

We utter these notes of warning, and ask their serious consideration by the personel of the Convention. If our exacitude touches the aspiring ambition of any near home, we will accept the result in the true Christian spirit of self denial. Steer clear of the rocks!

MONEY TO LOAN on good real estate security, by A. A. Beazley, Attorney at Law, Kalkaska, Mich. 16-4yr

MARINE.—L. D. Bartholomew, of this place, has traded his schooner, the Len Higby, for the square-topsail scow Supply, giving $900 difference. The Supply is a staunch vessel, seven years old, and will carry, 80 cords of wood. Capt. Gebo will sail her.

—Quite a fleet of vessels were detained here with their cargoes, for several days last week, by head winds. Friday the wind shifted, however, and they left.

—The propeller Fountain City had 120 passengers on her up trip last week. This testifies to the popularity of the steamer and her commander.

DEXTER & NOBLE, Elk Rapids, pay highest market price in cash for wheat and other grain. All representations that we pay in due bills is false, as we never bought a bushel of grain in that way, and do not intend to.

10 3t DEXTER & NOBLE.

SCHOOL.—The Charlevoix School Board have employed Prof. F. W. Mayne, of St. Lawrence Co. N. Y. as Principal of our School for the ensuing year. Prof. Mayne is a graduate of one of the New York State Normal Schools, and has the best of recommendations. Miss Lottie B. Ainslie, of this village, will conduct the Primary Department.

THE HARBOR WORK.—Capt. H. S. Dale, of Chicago, the contractor for the Charlevoix harbor work, arrived here Sunday. He proposes to enter at once, and energetically, into the work and to leave every dollar of the money, except his margin, with the people here. To this end, he will sub-let the timber work, and furnish employment to as many of our mechanics and laborers as he can advantageously handle. Capt. Dale is a veteran in harbor work, having followed it many years. He built the harbor of refuge at Sand Beach, Lake Huron, and has received therefor from the Government, up to date, $450,000. He has, in addition to our harbor the contract for the work at Grand Haven and Frankfort. We are satisfied that our harbor work is in good hands.

THE State Teachers' Institute for the counties of Antrim and Charlevoix will be held at the Blakely school house, near the head of Torch Lake, during the week commencing Sept. 9. The people in the neighborhood offer free board to all teachers in attendance

General News Summary.

DOMESTIC.

On the 30th ult., President Hayes proclaimed a declaration between the United States and Great Britain for the reciprocal protection of trade-marks in the two countries, which declaration is to the effect that the subjects or citizens of each of the contracting parties shall have in the dominions and possessions of the other, on complying with the laws thereof, the same rights as belong to native subjects or citizens, either at present or hereafter to be granted, in everything relating to property in trade-marks or trade-labels.

The prize offered had been withdrawn.

THERE was received at New Orleans, on the 31st ult., the first bale of new cotton from the Mississippi Valley, raised in Adams County, Miss. It was classed good-middling, and sold at auction for eighteen and a quarter cents per pound.

THE report that Gen. Mackenzie had again crossed the Rio Grande into Mexico, was denied on the 31st ult. The river was too high for crossing. Everything was reported quieten on the border.

THE corner stone of a big wheat, which had existed in Milwaukee and Chicago during the month, culminated on the afternoon of the 31st ult., in Milwaukee, Spring No. 2, during the day, sold for $1.30@1.30, and in Chicago for $1.08 to $1.10, and many settlements were made at these figures. A great many operators in both places, however, declined to fulfill their contracts, preferring to have the differences ascertained by arbitrators. It is believed that the liquidators of the corner have realized from $300,000 to $500,000.

Ancient and Modern Eyesight.

A curious controversy has lately sprung up in Germany as to whether the eye in the human race has always possessed the same delicacy as at present, and whether men at all epochs have had perfect orders as we now distinguish them. Dr. Magnus, an oculist, asserts that primitive man had only a confused notion of tints, and even did not recognize them all. Thus, the ancients only saw three colors in the prism instead of the seven which exist, and the sages of the North only speak of three in the rainbow. The most luminous in the spectrum, those which act with most intensity on the retina are red, orange and yellow; blue, indigo and violet only make a feeble impression; green occupies an intermediate rank. Well, throughout the records of antiquity only the red and yellow, so to say, are spoken of. According to Pliny, painters only employed those two colors, with black and white, to produce their finest effects. The most valued linens were dyed solely in red and yellow. The knowledge of green does not exist either in Sanscrit literature or Homer, who, in describing the verdure of the country, uses epithets relating to other colors. A savant, M. Geiger, asserts that he has proved that neither in the poems of the Rig-Veda nor the Arests, the Bible, the verses of Homer, the Koran, or the ancient literature of Finland or Scandinavia, is any mention of blue to be found. In fact, no word is to be traced in any of them to designate that color. Therefore, some people must have existed for whom verdure was not green, nor the skies blue. Even at this day, the inhabitants of Burmah have great difficulty in making a distinction between blue and green. Mr. Goldstone, whose knowledge of Greek is well known, is wholly of the opinion of Dr. Magnus. We have no occasion to say that those views are strongly contested.—Galignani's Messenger.

JUDGE BRADLEY T. JOHNSON argues, in an elaborate paper in the American Law Review for July, that the States of the Union can be compelled by judgment of the National Supreme Court, supported by the force of the Union, to pay their debts when they have practically repudiated them.

Alfonso's Solitary Grief in the Escurial.

After a wilderness of plain you see in the Escurial a small town built in a wilderness of rocks and mountains. This seems, indeed, a fit spot for the last abode of the sullen and despotic Prince, who, full of ambition and Tara Benin, and soured by the disappointments of the world, had come here to seek repose and meditation. Here his dark and intolerant spirit could brood over the deeds achieved by a policy which had crushed feudal Barons, turbulent aynntamientos, unbelieving burghers, distant Colonies and Flemish disloyalty under the awful spell of the Inquisition and the Council of Castile. Behind those silent and thick walls no outward influence could disturb the royal hermit in the two cells close to the chapel, where his stool, his table, his whatnot all yet remain three centuries after he has lain in the Pantheon de los Reyes below.

King Alfonso has selected this melancholy pile for the first retreat in which he mourns over his great and premature loss. No fitter abode could be imagined for one than the Palace of the Escurial. Its long galleries are silent, and its courts are much like the interior of a cathedral. Its gardens and terraces have a sort of Dutch regularity and sameness in their well-cut plants and neat alleys. The view from those terraces extends over the bare and rugged plain below, and across the lofty sierra behind. All over the place hangs a stillness undisturbed, save by the shrill whistle of a passing train, or by the tolling of the convent bell.

At early dawn this bell awakens King Alfonso, who rises as early as half-past five, when the sun is already high on the horizon in this country. His Majesty descends alone to the church, and hears mass every day in the chapel where lie the remains of his wife and children. He then on the marble pavement in prayer, while one of the aged chaplains recites prayers before that marble monument wherein are entombed his dearest happiness, his Cusions, his first love. Often when he rises to depart tears are on the face of the young monarch, and he compassionately asks to be left alone for this his first hour of a long day devoted to the exercise of his devotion in the Escurial.

At nine in the morning the Princess of Asturias, the Duke and Duchess of Montpensier, and the Infanta Christina, all have messages in the same chapel. After mass King Alfonso strolls alone in the gardens until his Secretary, Don Jose Morphy, arrives about nine. They work and read together until midday, when Alfonso XII. breakfasts with the Princess and Infantas, perhaps the only communications Rifles in her daily routine. At two the Royal family, with the military household assemble to receive His Majesty's commands for the day, and all dine with Queen Christina and O'Ryan before he retires, like most of his subjects, to his daily siesta. In the afternoon he gives audience to his Ministers, and rides out in the evening with the Duke of Montpensier.

Very little change has been made in the Escurial for the Royal family. By His Majesty's express orders, great simplicity is observed in all the arrangements of the royal apartments. He hallowers and his equipage of horse-guards do duty within the palace. The garrison of the town is composed of some infantry and artillery.—Madrid Cor. London Standard.

A DERBUH caused the fire which nearly destroyed Enterprise, Miss., recently. A man by lamp light was trying to rid his couch of vermin, hence the conflagration. The Chicago cow is avenged. Insurance companies will immediately amend their policies by inserting a bedbug clause.—N. O. Picayune.

INCIDENTS AND ACCIDENTS.

—The dress of Miss Warren, of a Texas party, was peculiar in being made of such striped cloth as convicts wear. Her brother was serving a term in State Prison, and she, being in him innocent, had made up her mind to display her sympathy.

—A lady at Binghamton, N. Y., while looking over her husband's old clothes, recently, discovered a letter which she had given him to post eleven years ago. The letter was addressed to a lady friend, and its non-arrival was the cause of an estrangement between the two families ever since.

—The horse of Mr. Charles Burckhardt, of Cincinnati, ran away, the other day, jumped over a wood-sawyer at work on a pile of wood, plunged through the summer room of a beer saloon, wrecking the interior badly, went out again through the plate-glass window, knocked the sprinkling arrangement off of a watering cart, tried to jump into an express wagon, and finally plunged through the windows on a street-car in which there were some what bruised, but otherwise safe and sound.

—Recently, while Dr. Williams, of Brookfield, was attending a patient, he was called out and found boys swarming about and lighting upon his horse. A large mule immediately made an attack upon him. The lady of the house threw a shawl over the doctor's horse, but we consider their observance of the proprieties not to be quite equal to our bounden and interchangeable duty. Since housekeeping is the principal business I have in hand, I want to do my best in that vocation; to be as conscientious and painstaking in that as I would in teaching music or any other accomplishment. I enjoy my work; it comes easy to me. I take both pleasure and pride in it, and I think the secret of my success in this humble sphere of mine has been my keeping everything up from the very first, and never allowing myself in the smallest particular to fall into slipshod ways."

Mark and Jane, now settled in their beautiful, well-ordered Christian home on the banks of the Connecticut, only the other evening spoke of the two lessons that December evening brought them, and the lasting impressions they wrought.—Mrs. Annie A. Preston, in Parchological Journal.

The thief finally got away, leaving the pantaloons in the hands of Mr. Allen, who, on examining the pockets, found a roll of bills containing $1,000.

OUR RADIX LETTER.

New York, Aug. 16, 1878.

EDITOR SENTINEL:

We have been regarded during the past week with an introduction to the workings of the Congressional Labor Committee, of whom the Hon. A. S. Hewitt, of this city, is the chairman, and Messrs. Rice of Massachusetts, Boyd of Illinois, and Thompson of Pennsylvania, the constituent members. Had Congress given these gentlemen a vacation, and instructed them to stop in New York and witness or take part in a farce the instruction could not have been more fully developed and realized than it was when they issued a general invitation to all classes to appear before them, and give their views as to the causes of the existing depression, and to suggest measures for its relief. Those who have thus far aired themselves, have as a general thing been Utopians, in the fullest meaning of the work. Communists, Socialists, Womens' Rights men and women, Spiritualists, long haired reformers of every kind, all have given those gentlemen to understand that they are the masters of the situation and that it is only by their sovereign will that Congress or the Government is permitted to exist. Under their propositions there is to be or would be a general millenium. Property is to be equally divided. The man who works and saves is to have no more than he who rides and spends, and Government is to act the part of a patriarchal parent and see to everything. Government is to run the railroads, telegraphs, and all other works now carried on by companies. Government is to employ everybody, pay everybody, hold everything in trust for everybody, but above all things, Government is to a strictly honest pays, no more Credit Mobiliers; no more subsidizing railroad, telegraph or steamboat companies. There is to be but one general christian brotherhood, under which all will set in concord, and every man will take his neighbor by the hand, call him brother, and divide his substance with him. The most amusing feature that this cold and unfeeling world which does not sympathize with these visionary views encounters, is the extreme pertinacity which these same Utopians hold on the little worldly pelf in their possession. Even that extreme communist and socialist, Justus H. Schwab, will not give a suffering brother a glass of beer without the necessary quid pro quo in the shape of a five cent piece.

I hope that we shall not soon be involved in a war which would enable us to use our new style of submarine weapons, but if we should happen to become so involved, I think we could show a thing or two to any men-of-war which might seek to invade the harbor of New York. Major General Abbott, of the regular army, has been busy for a week experimenting with some new torpedoes at Willard's Point, and the results of these have been to prove that the heaviest vessels may be blown into the air at a moment's warning. A large number of torpedoes were exploded at different depths and under various conditions, the effects in each case being carefully noted for future reference. The final experiment was the blowing up of a 200 ton schooner in the presence of a large number of spectators. The scene on this occasion reminded one of the memorable blowing up of Hell Gate.

The torpedo, containing a hundred pounds of powder, was sunk beneath the vessel and connected by an electric wire the station on shore. When all was in readiness, Gen Abbott touched the key, and immediately there was a violent commotion of the water under the schooner. She snapped amidships as if made of pasteboard, with a loud, deep report, her timbers were torn as if they were straws, and a confused mass of water, planks, fragments of wood, black dust, and a volume of smoke, through which darted a large red globe of fire, was hurled up to a height of at least 100 feet. For a moment the whole mass balanced in the air and then fell. All that remained of the schooner was the top of the cabin deck. Of the remainder of the vessel no two planks were left together. Photography was called in to record the experiment, several instantaneous views of the explosion being obtained in its different stages.

That was an odd robbery that startled the few dwellers in Vesey street last week, and which still remains an impenetrable mystery. A family named King had slowly and painfully accumulated a small fortune of $30,000, and being more than suspicious of Savings Banks, real estate, stocks and all other investments, thought to get the "dead wood" on financial casualties by putting the amount into gold and government bonds and hiding it in an old valise in the attic. This plan worked to a charm for some months; the little dark closet that held all this treasure kept its own counsel and the family chuckled over wisdom and prudence every time they read of a faithless cashier or a broken trust institution. But about a week ago all this happiness was turned to gall by the untoward discovery one fine evening that the staple and padlock guarding the secret fortune hung broken and useless from the closet door, and that the fortune aforesaid had taken wings and flown away. Talk has been plenty on Vesey street since that night, and the detectives are worrying their lives out trying to find the bold and knowing thief who showed such a nose for secreted coin, but nothing has been accomplished and the King family are turning wearily back to the pickle factory to essay once more the accumulation of a competency which, if obtained, will probably be deposited elsewhere than in the domestic attic.

The Fifth Avenue Hotel, par excellence the representative hotel of the metropolis, commenced on August 1st the twentieth year of its business career more prosperous and with greater prestige than ever before. It remains as ever a thoroughly cosmopolitan house, being quite as well known among the traveling aristocracy of Europe as among the highest class of American society. It was there that the Prince of Wales resided when in the city on his memorable trip of twenty years ago, and since that time hundreds of less distinguished visitors from abroad have proved its hospitality.

For many a year the Fifth Avenue has been one of the institutions of New York. For banquets, for political and financial conferences, as well as for social assemblages of the highest order, it has become the most famous resort of the metropolis. Following the general tendencies of times the management celebrated the anniversary already named by reducing the rates from $5 to $4 per day.

THE LABOR INVESTIGATION.

The Committee of the National House of Representatives to consider the financial and labor depression question met in New York City, on the 1st. There were present Messrs. A. S. Hewitt (N. Y.), J. M. Thompson (Penn.), W. W. Rice (Mass.) and Thomas A. Boyd (Ill.). Went was received that H. L. Herbert (Ore.) would not be able to serve until after the October elections.

After an executive session, the Committee decided to sit daily, and hear such persons as might appear, taking the risk of their expenses being repaid.

Thomas Brock, who represented the stonemasons, wished the Committee to recommend that all Government work should be done by people of the place in which the Government buildings are being erected. He spoke against the exercise of giving out contracts for Government buildings to the contractor made the cheapest bid. The contractor made the cheapest bid, the Government might save by employing the workmen directly. He did not intend to apply the rule to private individuals, and would not advise the Government to regulate wages. Much of the want of employment has arisen from the use of machinery. The sawing of stone was a good instance. If there was no machinery, the sawyers might compel men to work only for wages fixed by the society.

Hugh McGregor, one of the self-constituted committee consisting of Justus Schwab, F. Bauer and himself, addressed the Committee on the subject of the Government collecting statistics of the laboring classes, and so arranging them that they could be readily referred to. He said it was the duty of the United States to examine into every department of the labor question, including the sanitary condition of the laboring classes. He charged that the use of child labor in factories was the cause of many of the deformities. The lack of employment for families now devolves the support of the men, and children, rather than the men. The Committee asked McGregor if he was willing to take as oath as to the truth of what he stated, and he answered he did not like to swear to facts, and compared any similar oath to other cities to be expended in public works. Where these works would have to be sufficient returns, then let the Government pay for them, and the jobs destroyed, as secured bonds are.

Mrs. Mary Hale, who represented herself as a member of the "Working Women's Protective Union of the City of New York," said the first step necessary to improve the condition of the working people was to organize. Give women the ballot and everything would be right.

James H. Smith, who announced that he represented the Socialistic Labor party, said that some of previous speakers the last two days had proposed little. He wished neither paternalism nor communism, nor an eight-hour law, but he did not want anything done in a manner to discriminate between master and man. He was a practical man of business, and the rights of capital should be given and wherever he could get it, and for as many hours as he could labor.

Several "labor reformers" were before the Committee on the 2d. Among them was one named Hall, who said a healthy statement and said no man had a right to take a claim for land, for God says, "Ye shall not sell the land forever." We have violated the laws of God, and find all property equal everywhere.

Matthew Cohen, formerly a manufacturer of silk cloaks, and large manufacturer had grossly failed in business and the sufferers among dealers and he requested the Committee to attend to these matters.

Mr. Graham, Secretary of the Workingmen's Union, held that we do not desire the introduction of the Old World to come here and upset our Government. He did not intend to make a speech as when honestly accumulated, but he denounced railroad monopolies and the combination of provisions, etc., by stock jobbing and speculation, and the latter ought to be stopped by legislation. Stop railroad jobs and give the country the benefit. Our shipping has been driven off the seas by foreign steamers. If Congress has a revenue in favor of freight. Be would like large unemployed population in cities to be sent to the prairie lands and settled thereon by private capitalists.

At the 3d inst. Mr. Randall, a new speaker, spoke, but no news. Mr. Marshall said he did not want to see protection against prisoners. He thought the removal of taxes as much as possible, consistently with revenue, desirable and that no taxes, and the abolition of the profit-bearing Government currency from banks. The banks so abused would revive the shipping trade.

Ira Steward, of Boston, representing the National Labor Reform Association, attributed the present depression to reduction in the currency simultaneously with inflation and not enough taxation.

The President of the Cigar Makers' Union spoke of the cause of the depression in the cigar trade only. He said while the number of cigars manufactured steadily increased the number of the cigar-makers got worse. The trouble has been caused by the General Government by a system of taxation which throws immense sums into the hands of large manufacturers. The first cause is the introduction of 2,000 Cuban into the trade in San Francisco, and in New York the tenement-house system caused ruin. The system is a shame and disgrace. The whole family, man, woman and children, work day and night, from fourteen to eighteen hours, and still only make enough to live, or rather starve, on, and when the cigar-makers struck for wages the landlords, who were the manufacturers, turned 1,000 wretched families into the street. He asked that the tenement-house system be abolished, and that cigars be allowed to be made only in factories. He was not opposed to Chinamen as cigar-makers, but was opposed to the importation of Chinese or any other labor under such a system. He was opposed to the importation of all labor by contract.

PERSONAL AND LITERARY.

—Union College has given Edison the degree of Doctor of Philosophy.

—Mrs. Myra Clark Gaines is a little more than seventy-three years old.

—Senator Gordon, of Georgia, has bought a tract of several thousand acres in Worth County, Ga., for a sheep farm.

—It is reported that the King of the Belgians has offered to defray the expenses of another trip across Africa by Stanley, and that the latter has accepted the offer.

—The poems of Homer were chiefly traditional and oral, till Pisistratus collected them in writing four or five hundred years after the age of the poet, just as Ossian was collected by Macpherson.

—Jesse Pomeroy, the Boston boy murderer, was recently put to work in Concord (Mass.) Prison, but he willfully spoiled $75 worth of stock, and now none of the officers are allowed to speak to him, and he has to endure solitary confinement with nothing to do.

—The term Blue Stocking, applied to literary ladies, was conferred on a society which was called the Blue Stocking Club, in which females were admitted; and so called owing to a Mr. Benjamin Stillingfleet, one of its acting members, always wearing blue stockings.

—Of the report that a nephew of Senator Sumner married a wandering actress old enough to be his mother, who, after a short honeymoon, left him for parts unknown, and that he had lived in vain to have the wife acknowledged and received by his relatives in Boston, the Boston Journal says: "Senator Sumner left no nephew for the simple reason that he never had one. The twin sister of the Senator, Matilda, died unmarried, and George, Jane, Mary and Horace were never married. His brother Albert and sister Julia were married and had daughters only."

—A New York letter relates the following: "A gentleman was in Orange, N. J., the other day. He wanted to go to the mountain. There was no coach at hand. A gentleman in a carriage offered the stranger a seat, which was accepted. The gentleman was civil and pointed out the beauties of the region. He seemed to have the faculty of drawing men out rather than of conversing himself. 'Gen. McClellan lives in this neighborhood, I believe,' said the visitor. 'He does. He has a small home on the mountain.' The drive was extended. The courteous gentleman seemed to have many acquaintances. Nearly every passer on foot or in carriage lifted his hat. Public men were talked of. The stranger was about to ask about the 'General,' and now wonders that he did not. The coach pulled up at an elegant mansion, and the gentleman said: 'This is Gen. McClellan's house; won't you walk in?' And this is Gov. McClellan, I presume,' said the stranger. 'At your service,' was the response."

Lost Immortality.

LAST Sunday a vender of pomades and purgatives in Battle Mountain conceived the idea of acquiring fame and astonishing his friends and relatives in the past by representing himself as a noted sea-lifter, and furnishing a regular proof of his prowess on the warpath. He engaged two decrepit Shoshone bucks, whose faces glistened with vermilion, to decorate their scalplocks with feathers and go with him in Lake's photograph tent and have their pictures taken, while he stood in the background with a dumble-barreled shot gun, shouting, "Surrender, savages!" To make the scene as tragic as possible he gathered a tot of beef bones from the rear of a hotel and scattered them around the Indians. The preliminaries having been arranged to his satisfaction, the photograph man fixed his machine and was in the act of getting it inserted on the ground when the Indians, saying, "Heap no good; maybe shoot!" skedaddled from the tent as fast as their legs could carry them, and have not been seen since. The white brave wanted a photograph of the group with slaughter-yard surroundings to send back to his friends in New York to show them how he captured two Bannock warriors at the muzzle of a shotgun. The unexpected departure of the Indians deprived him of the opportunity to immortalize himself, and he is now the most disconsolate artist in the State of Nevada.—Winnemucca (Nev.) Silver State.

—Many times are plainly visible at fashionable watering places. The ladies do not appear in such elaborate toilets, and retrenchment is in order among gentlemen.

Women Traveling Alone.

The story which was published in a morning newspaper a few days ago of the abduction of a lady from a railroad car in the central part of this State was on its face too improbable to be believed without a better authentication of names and dates than was given. According to the report, the lady was traveling to Albany to meet her husband. Two men, strangers to her, were in the car. When the conductor approached to receive the lady's ticket they told him that she was insane, that they were friends or relatives of hers, that she was under their charge, and that they were taking her to the asylum at Utica. The indignant denials and passionate remonstrances of the lady were represented by the men to be the signs and the results of her malady. As she knew no person on the train who could confirm her account of herself, the conductor was induced to believe the account of the two men, and to permit them to remove the lady at Utica, notwithstanding her piteous appeals and her coherent and probable narrative. When the train reached Albany the waiting husband was found, and a special engine carried him and the conductor to Utica, before the lady was discovered, not in the asylum but in a private house, and not in time to prevent great suffering on her part.

This story has been contradicted by some of the newspapers of Boston, where the lady was reported to dwell, and, strange to say, has not confirmed tardily and in part by other newspapers of the same city. We do not refer to it to discuss the question, or to express an opinion on the truth of the story, further than to say that either the story is false or the unnamed conductor acted with criminal stupidity or indifference. We mention the matter in connection with some changes of circumstance, which have arisen since it first happened; and because the report brings up the whole question of the unattended traveling of women and the annoyances and dangers which are incidental to it.

We say that this thing might have happened because women have been taken, not from a railroad car and from among strangers, but from their homes and friends, from among those who have been shut up in asylums for the insane, without any just cause for their deprivation of liberty. If their relatives have been able to deceive physicians supposed to be familiar with the human mind and their victims helpless in the very presence of so humiliating impulsiveness, is it hard to believe that persons who knew nothing of the facts, who have not even the right which acquaintanceship gives to interfere or to make inquiries, might be deceived by men who had shrewdly contrived to represent themselves as relatives of a woman traveling alone, in a case similar to the one which has been reported in the Times? With proper safeguards against wrongful imprisonment for insanity, however, such a thing never could happen. Under improvisory provisions requiring an order from a court, upon sufficient proof, as a warrant for such proceedings, the men who pretended to be the custodians of the Boston lady—if any men did so pretend—would have been required to show their authority at every step of the journey. The looseness on the subject which has prevailed so long in the legislation of Christian countries and its counterpart in the carelessness and the connivance of the Albany train—if there was such a train or such a conductor. The event, if it happened, or the event which might happen, is an illustration of the humane timeliness of the new and earnest opposition which has been given everywhere to this subject of the treatment of the insane.

The case, real or imaginary, suggests the question, Should women travel alone? It would involve much special hardship and general exposure to our civilization to be obliged to answer the question in the negative. Women do travel alone and in safety; and nowhere have they a larger liberty in this respect than in this country. So far as united knights and tournaments and crusades and wagers of battle and like barbarisms are concerned the age of chivalry has passed; but there is abroad a chivalric spirit which appears to every woman who wants and deserves it a protection as copious and efficient as the stoutest cavalier ever gave to maidens in distress. Partly owing to this spirit, and partly owing to the careful investigations of the agents of our carrying companies, it is a fact substantially without exception that a woman may travel unattended, in perfect safety and comfort, from one end of the Union to the other. Even the petty annoyances women are subject to, the circumstances of the case, actual or invented, which we have mentioned, are so peculiar that they scarcely come within the rule, and it must be admitted that they are so likely to carry them and have not been seen since. The white brave wanted a photograph of the group with slaughter-yard surroundings to send back to his friends in New York to show them how he captured two Bannock warriors at the muzzle of a shotgun. The unexpected departure of the Indians deprived him of the opportunity to immortalize himself, and he is now the most disconsolate artist in the State of Nevada.—Winnemucca (Nev.) Silver State.

Mr. Quiggles Clears Up the Gloom.

"I'll tell you how it is," said Quiggles, to a friend, who was complaining of being crowded into a corner, "you can make a fortune by going into bankruptcy, if your debts are only big enough to make it an object. The more you owe, the more you make, don't you see?"

"No. I'll be smothered if I do," said the unfortunate friend. "I owe enough, mercy knows, if that's all you want, but how I'm to pay even fifty cents on the dollar, and have anything left to commence over again, is one of the things I can't see into."

"But you don't want to pay your debts, man. Well, but you are a green one—that is too good. Pay! Ha-ha! What are you going to fail for?"

"Coz I can't help it. Bung it all, what are you laughing about?"

"But you can't afford to fail in these hard times, unless you can make a snug thing out of it. You mustn't plunge headlong into ruin with your eyes shut," said Quiggles, adjusting his diamond pin.

"Mustn't I?"

"No! never do in the world. Have your wits about you and keep your head clear. Don't let the trouble worry you to the fogging your brain with too much drink. Wouldn't do at all. Keep your eye peeled and watch for the main chance."

"Yes—yes; I see. But how?"

"You fancy appoint your own receiver, and be sure to select the worst muttonhead you can find. Get a man that don't know enough to drive a cow, and too lazy to add up a column of figures, even if he knows how. If you can find an ignoramus that can't read, so much the better. Make him believe you ain't handy anything to divide, and you can buy him off cheap."

"So, so, that's the way, is it? Go on. I'm learning fast."

"Well, the racket is gone enough and not too blamed awkward to stumble on the true state of things accidentally, you know, and have a bit of trouble. Whack up with him right off the start, chuck his eyes chock full of dust, keep your own counsel and rake in the pile."

"But the creditors—what are they to do?"

"Them? Oh, they can hold the bag and take what drops, but you take mighty good care to hold the screen steady and see that nothing gets through. Play it fine, and you're heeled, old boy, mark me. I'm talking by the book, for I've been there myself, you know."

And Quiggles consulted his magnificent stem-winder and said it was short time of day to refresh.—Cincinnati Breakfast-Table.

Insects in South America.

In reviewing "Fifteen Thousand Miles on the Amazon and its Tributaries," the Spectator refers to the insect life of that region, of which we have had occasion frequently to speak. The narrative, it says, "impresses one with an idea of almost truthfulness, and certainly does not stimulate a desire to visit the localities spoken of. In the first place, the journey was nothing but one long martyrdom from insect tormentors. Imagination fails to conceive of more numerous and variety; of more persistent and active pests than mosquitoes, some kinds of which have bills of immense length, and inflict a sting as sharp as if they had been plunged into strong acid; ticks, of several varieties; venomous ants; minute flies, which persist in drinking the moisture from the human eye; and large bees, more like beetles, that can hit a blow by their own impetus which lays the subject which has provoked it on the ground. Nor is the misery confined to the insect world. Snakes, alligators, jaguars, and other animals, are always on the watch for human prey, and the Indians, who are supposed to be familiar with the habits of the country, are constantly falling victims to the attacks of one or other of these foes. Even the vegetable world is against the traveler, for the forests are somewhat thickly peopled with poisonous trees, whose very shade is said to be dangerous, and whose fruit, though in some cases delicious, is in others deadly. Add to this that the climate is one of extreme heat and moisture, that the rivers are infested with alligators, and that the natives are treacherous, and the reader will be inclined to think that the author has painted the picture in the darkest colors. But, on the whole, he seems to have made the best of his journey, and to have enjoyed it in spite of the many drawbacks which he encountered. Now that the Amazon is open to the commerce of the world, it is probable that many travelers will follow in his track, and it is to be hoped that they will be as successful as he was."

Origin of Heat-Waves.

Now that the torrid season is practically over, one of the questions naturally suggested by the terrific heat-waves which spasmodically fall upon us is: What is their origin? Are they due to local influences, or directly caused by fluctuations in the sun itself? Does the great source of light and heat remain uniform in its supplies, or are its forms subject to periodic ebb and flow? In short, is the sun a variable star? Startling as an affirmative answer to this last question might appear, there would really be nothing strange in such a fact. The fixed stars are known to be gigantic suns, shining by their own light, and giving out, undoubtedly, enormous quantities of heat, although we are too distant to perceive it, and each is probably the center of an attendant system of planets just as our sun is. Yet among these far-off suns we find many subjects to periodic variations of brilliancy, appearing and disappearing with almost clockwork regularity, or suddenly flashing up as new suns and as quickly fading away forever.

One of the most striking examples of this variable class is the star Mira, or "The Wonderful," in the constellation of The Whale. This singular body passes every eleven years, through the zone of the solar system, and engage in mercantile or manufacturing through a succession of changes which occupy about eleven months it is absolutely invisible, although, when at its brightest, it equals in splendor a star of the second magnitude. Its greatest brilliancy, too, is not always the same. It does not increase and decrease by the same gradations, nor are the maximum and minimum of its variations constant. In fact, while the average period of its changes is about 331 days, the star is also subject to many minor irregularities. Another variable sun of short period is Algol, in Perseus. At its brightest this star is commonly of the second magnitude, but in less than four hours it falls to one of the fourth magnitude, and remains in that condition for twenty minutes. Then it begins to increase in brightness, and in three hours and a half more has regained its rank as a second-magnitude star, and sometimes to hold it for two days and a half, when it again passes through its periodic changes. There are no means isolated cases. The number of stars known to be variable is large; some of them pass through a round of variations in long and others in short periods, and all are apparently liable to modifications which conform to no fixed rules.

Several facts seem to indicate that our sun is a variable star of the same kind, though not subject to such extreme changes as Mira and Algol. It is frightful to think what would happen if it suddenly should go out, as for four years, as Mira once did, or even diminish greatly in brightness for a few years. Such a thing would happen to us like a second deluge. Rivers would dry up in the hottest summer days, and the whole earth would become a frozen desert. Fortunately, the sun's variable star of the same kind, though not subject to such extreme changes as Mira and Algol. HOME, FARM AND GARDEN.

—Kerosene applied with a rag, to stoves, will keep them from rusting during the summer; also good for iron utensils on the farm.

—Pit one or two red peppers, or a few pieces of charcoal, into a pot where ham, cabbage, etc., is boiling, and the house will not be filled with the offensive odor.

—Your farm is your fixed capital; improvements are your investments; and your crops, over the cost of your production, are your dividends.—Prairie Farmer.

—Three crops of weeds plowed under in succession, when about six inches high, will, it is said, prepare a fine, clean crop of almost anything that is seasonable to plant afterward.

—To Whiten Porcelain Sauce-pans.—Have the pans half filled with hot water, throw in a tablespoonful of powdered borax and let it boil. If this does not remove all stains, soap a cloth, sprinkle on plenty of powdered borax. Scour it well.

—Lemon Jelly.—Grate the rind and take the juice of one lemon, pare and grate six sour apples, one cup of sugar, one egg, one teaspoonful of flour, beat all thoroughly together and let it come to a boil. This is very nice to use between cakes in place of other jelly.

—Orange Custards.—The juice of six oranges strained and sweetened with white sugar. Stir over a slow fire till the sugar is dissolved, taking off the scum; when nearly cold add the yolks of six eggs well beaten and a pint of cream or milk. Stir over the fire till it thickens, and serve in glasses. It should not come to a boil.

—Baked Apple-Dumplings.—These we think are very nice and superior to those boiled or steamed. Roll thin any kind of short crust, cut it into square pieces. Pare and remove the cores from nice stewing apples and cut an apple in each piece. You see that all work is easy if systematically done. Now a lesson on another disagreeable duty—dish-washing. Keep the outside of the dishes clean by removing all the crumbs and scraps before washing them. The dish-washing of some housekeepers must be very disagreeable and tedious, owing to their nonobservance of this precaution. Stack the table dishes, like to like, in the order of their size, in the dish-pan, and the cooking dishes in another, immediately pouring hot suds through them all. Puncture one corner of the dish cloth with a fork, and, winding the time up in it like a cocoon, wash the dishes with it, wetting the hand but momentarily during the whole operation. After pouring off the rinsing-water—which have very hot—remove them in stacks to another pot, and place them on their edges about some tall dish to dry and drain. Rinse and drain forks and spoons by themselves in a pitcher. By following these directions the process of dish-washing can be made less irksome than it usually is.—Washington Star.

The Farm as an Investment.

The man who by inheritance or some lucky turn of the wheel of fortune finds himself in the possession of a moderate fortune, is often sadly perplexed in looking for a safe investment. Shall he invest in railroad stocks? He turns to the quotations in a file of papers and becomes perhaps frighten him. He realizes that an Astronomic disaster or "strike" in which a riotous mob holds possession for a few hours, may wipe out the profits of years. Or, if he is engage in mercantile or manufacturing business, a careful examination of his affairs convinces him that a very large proportion of those in such business fail. If he lends his money there is more or less risk, and forclosing mortgages is neither a pleasant nor profitable business.

To all who are looking for a safe investment we would recommend the farm. And we do this in face of the statement which we meet so often, that money invested in farms does not pay 3 per cent. We believe that aside from the safety of the investment, it can be shown that money put in a farm will be found equally as profitable as when loaned upon mortgage, where the same care is applied over it. We do not mean that a man with a wife and four children (to support and educate) has $10,000 ready cash. He invests it on first mortgage security, at 8 per cent. Aside from what he may earn by his personal efforts, his income is $800. Out of this he must pay house-rent, buy his food, fuel, provisions, groceries and dry-goods, school-bills and books, and if the family indulge in travel, livery-stable bills and fare, and before the year is out he will find the closest economy necessary to avoid debt.

On the other hand, let him invest his ten thousand in a good farm—eight thousand in land and the remaining two thousand in some choice stock and a good team and family carriage. With $8,000 it will be easy to buy from 150 to 160 acres of good land all under fence and with good buildings. His farm will furnish him beef, mutton, pork, eggs and poultry, with fruit and vegetables, milk, cream and butter—and all of the best quality. His horses and carriage are always at the service of the family, and if he wishes to be a man of leisure he can readily find good tenants who are glad to rent private his land for half the crops, finding their own team and tools. By keeping the larger part of his farm in grass he can sell some stock each year, and have left a large surplus of corn in condition to grow heavy crops. He has already had from his farm what would cost him in town five or six hundred dollars, and certainly it will be easy, with good crops and average prices, to sell enough produce from the farm to make his income better for the support of his family than 8 per cent. on his $10,000 would be, and he need not consult the last new quotations daily to know whether he is worth anything or not.—Practical Farmer.

How to Increase Property.

It is seldom advisable for women who have a sufficient income to attempt its increase by exchanges or investing it in business. But there are many whose income is inadequate, and who are under the necessity of increasing their income or of leaning on their friends. Supposing a woman in these circumstances is of an independent spirit, and resolves not to depend on the assistance of friends, my first suggestion to her would be to resolve that, come what may, her present property shall not be diminished. And if to what she has she can, by self-denial, and earnest effort, add something from time to time, the title will at length turn to her favor. She may hear ill-natured, "Molly Stark has gone into teaching, has become a governess, is copying law papers—quite a tumble." Well, Molly Stark is not beholden to such, nor ever will be.

Saving and laying up is the habit that succeeds. It seems to be in the blood of some families of both sexes alike to be independent. Cost what it may of present self-denial, they will set the ball rolling that will grow into a round competence. How much better and happier is such a life in the long-run than a life of suplneness and semi-independence.

A resolute woman is pretty sure to find one way or another to do that which will be remunerative, and her prospects of working out her pecuniary salvation, I think, are better than those of the average man in the same circumstances. Of course, in all cases it depends on losing no time and saving and laying up her savings.—"Hints to Women on the Care of Property."

A Hotel Swindle.

Scene, a hotel in a small town—but a flourishing town—in Illinois. A young man arrives, calls for the best room in the house. He enters his name in a bold hand on the register as Turner, of the jewelry house of "Smith & Co., New York. Manufactory at Providence, R. I." The first thing he asks for is letters; finding that there are none, he particularly inquires of the times for the arrival of the mail, as letters of great importance were to meet him there. Has had a dusty ride, It is some time before the dinner hour, and he orders a bottle of the best wine in the house; he does not like to drink alone, and the landlord must help him dispose of the bottle. The young man's outré want seems to be letters, and all the next day he asks at every mail's arrival for letters. At last the looked-for letter comes, he hastily opens it in presence of the landlord and takes out a check. He causes the stupefied the cashier of the house in New York. "He might have known that there was no bank at this place. I charge him to always send money in a registered letter, and here is a confounded useless check (for $100 or $200, as may be). I'm sorry I missed you, as I am compelled to go to —— (the next town), where I must go at once, and here I am with this useless check. And more of the same sort. The landlord is good-natured, the young man is good looking, and free with his wine, and the chances are that the landlord finds the young man's trouble, and offers to cash the check—minus the young man's wine and board bill. Young man is very grateful, gets his check cashed, and starts to the next town for his campaign. But he does not stop there, he goes on to some other place, as may have been agreed upon, where the same game is played over again; the same anxiety about letters, the same disappointment at receiving a check instead of money, in a town where there was no bank, and the checks are not drawn on some New York bank, it is a number of days before the landlords discover that they have mere worthless paper, and the young man, who, of course, never goes where he says he is going, is far out of reach.

A large number of landlords in the Western States hold the worthless checks of "Smith, Melville & Co., New York, Manufactory at Providence, R. I." But of course the name is changed from time to time. We have seen these checks, and can say that, taken as checks, they are very pretty.—American Agriculturist.

The Modern Duel.

Two young men loved the same lass in Kinderbunk, N. Y.; one was accepted and the other rejected; and the unsuccessful lover challenged the successful one to a duel with pistols, which was fought last Sunday afternoon under the trees on the Wilkins farm. There were two seconds. The ground was duly paced off, and the rivals, with faces as pale as death, were placed in position, when the dentist's rival heaved a parley. The seconds looked at the other man. A tumultuous struggle was raging in his breast. Like a flash he conceived a trick, and there was many a girl in the world. While these thoughts flashed through his mind the courage of his opponent was rapidly oozing out at his finger-ends, and simultaneously they cast down their weapons, and, to the utter surprise and disgust of the waiting seconds, rushed upon each other. A short, sharp struggle followed, and at the close the disappointed swain lay with a bleeding nose at the feet of his foe, who demanded the immediate surrender of all claim to the beautiful cause of strife. The jealous soul surrendered, and the victorious lover went home to his bread and cheese and kisses.—N. Y. Tribune.

GRAIN IN CHARLEVOIX COUNTY.—The Secretary of State has published a tabular statement of grain raised in the several counties of Michigan in the year 1877; the number of acres sown in 1878 and the probable yield, etc Charlevoix County has one Township not reported. In 1877 we had 871 acres of wheat yielding 13,185 bushels. Let it be borne in mind this is wheat alone. In 1878 there were on the ground 1,366 acres of wheat, which, at the same average yield per acre (about 15 bushels) will furnish 20,449 bushels of wheat. It is the universal opinion, however, that the yield will greatly exceed that of last year. This shows the increase of yield in 1878 to be nearly fifty per cent. over that of 1877. The number of acres of other grains raised in the county in 1877, was, oats, 640, corn, 467, barley 21. The yield is not given.

Tent Life at Charlevoix.

Rev. L. F. Compton, pastor of the Baptist church, Sturgis, after an enjoyable experience of a few weeks at the Baptist Summer Resort, writes to the Journal as follows:

Perchance you and your readers will enjoy reading something of the place in the north woods. The ride here is not the most exhilarating, though there is an abundance of sand and pines; if it is the ride one is looking for, I would suggest some other route. (A ride from 6 o'clock A. M. to 12 o'clock midnight with the thermometer crowding close on 100 degrees in the shade is not calculated to be the most inspiring anywhere.) But the end of the journey was what we were after. Suffice it to say that when we found the end we also found occasion to put on a thick coat, and had the sublime privilege of going to bed, putting a blanket over us and sleeping the remainder of the night without any intimation whatever of dogdays. Oh, what a privilege, what a joy to get away from the heat, away from the rills and rivulets of perspiration, away from where one needs to stand in a tub or pail for four in will dissolve entirely and not leave a drop of consolation to his friends, away where it is cool, where sleep is a pleasure and delight, and land a luxury and life an inspiration. Well, here we have found them all. One wonders what has become of the heat, the perspiration and all the misery of the heated town. With the thermometer among the eighties there is no sweating and puffing and secking of fans and the ever luxuriant shade. Men work right on and scarcely realize that it is warm. Flannel underclothing is not a burden. What a change! I can scarcely realize it. It may be accounted for in part from the fact that we are so far north, in part from the fact that we at Charlevoix are located on an elevated point that just out between Lake Michigan and Pine Lake, (the latter is about 15 miles long by about one mile wide,) and hence have an almost constant breeze, the most refreshing exhilarating imaginable. The Charlevoix Baptist Summer Resort is one of the most delightful spots on earth, during July and August. My wife, boy and myself are living here in a tent 10 feet by 14 feet. When we go to bed we say, "what a grand night for sleeping," when we awake we exclaim, "what a beautiful morning," and when we eat we cannot help but remark, "what grand fish, potatoes, peas, beans, fruit, everything." It all seems so much better than at home. It seems better, and much of it is better. The fish and vegetables are so much better as the best beef steak is better than the poorest. They are firmer, richer and fresher. And what shall I say more? Come and see for yourself and then call me an enthusiast if you want to.

Elsewhere we give a statement of grain raised in Charlevoix County in 1877, and the acreage of the year. Considering that Charlevoix is the smallest county in the State, the showing is very satisfactory, as is also the increase shown of the acreage of this year over that of last. With such strides as this in grain raising, Charlevoix County cannot but be on the threshold of an importance which shall be recognized. These facts must show conclusively that a flouring-mill at this the central marketing point, would even now prove a profitable investment, and in the future a means of securing a fortune. Let it be borne in mind that in addition to the figures given, Charlevoix is the natural grain market, for an old and extensive farming country in the Northern part of Antrim County, and which yields many thousand bushels of grain annually. It is believed by experienced men that within three years a mill with four runs of stones would find steady grinding from the grain which will be naturally tributary to this point. Let some one take hold of the matter.

PICTURES.—J. W. Boyer, an experienced artist, has his tent pitched opposite this office. He has taken several views of Charlevoix, which are remarkably true to nature, and will make fine ornaments for our center tables or parlor walls. He takes gems, photographs and other pictures, and his prices are marvelous in cheapness. An excellent opportunity now offers itself to secure pictures of your children and friends. Call and see his specimens.

DIED.—Asher B King, of Ewaline, died on Saturday. Mr. King was a son-in-law of Hugh Miller of this Township, and an old settler of the region. He was buried Sunday.

TRAGEDY.—Capt. A. H. Coates, shot his wife through the heart, and then shot himself, at Saugatuck last week. He was alive at last accounts, but cannot live. Jealousy is assigned as the cause. Capt. Coats will be remembered by our village readers as Master of the tug Minter, which worked in this harbor some time last spring.

TRADE.—A. R. Upright has exchanged his half of the schooner Willard A. Smith, with A. R. Struthers, of South Arm, for his farm in in that Township, paying him some difference.

UNKNOWN THIEF.—One day last week Levi House and wife, of Hayes, came to town leaving their children at home. During the absence of the parents an unknown drunken Indian drove the children from the house, collected a quantity of supplies, and left. MARINE.—The propeller Java, from Buffalo to Chicago, sank in 200 feet of water, on the 18th, off Point Au Sable on the Michigan side, with a valuable cargo of mixed merchandise, most of which will be an entire loss. She was an iron vessel of 1,700 tons burthen, and cost $170,000. She was valued this year at $100,000 The cargo was fully insured, and the vessel was insured for $88,000. The breaking of the starboard coupling, and knocking out the side of the vessel was the cause of the accident. No lives were lost. The Java was the steamer commanded by Capt. Dodge, just before he took command of the Van Raalte.

—The tug T. W. Ferry, from Grand Haven, was here Tuesday with a party of fishermen.

—L. D. Bartholomew, of this place, has purchased the steam yacht Nellie Booth, and put her on Pine Lake to run alternate days with the Gazelle.

An important basis of the prosperity of Petoskey, or of any town, is the development of the surrounding country. Some indications of this latter was seen by your correspondent, on a recent trip to Advance, a little village about 18 miles southwest of Petoskey, on Pine Lake.—Petoskey Record.

Petoskey, you know, is the hub, around which revolves all creation and part of Canada. We once heard of a lunatic who imagined himself God. If these Petoskey people keep on inflating their imagination they will have Chicago and Charlevoix of secondary importance to Petoskey, and a part of the "surrounding country." Humph!

"LITTLE NELLIE."—A seven-year old child, Nellie Carr, arrived in Detroit a few days ago from St. John, N. B. She traveled the entire distance on the rail (1,700 miles) without any other companion save her "little dolly," and throughout the trip was the pet of all the passengers through whose watchful care and tender regard the unprotected little waif arrived in safety.—Ex.

Our readers will at once recognize "Little Nellie" as the daughter of Joseph Holland, and the foster-child of Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Carr, formerly of this place. Mr. Carr died some time ago in New Brunswick, and the child was undoubtedly being returned to the care of her natural father, who resides near Kalamazoo.

Carpenter & Bartholomew's rapidly increasing trade has obliged them to procure more room. They have leased the Morgan property, adjoining their place of business, which they will use for furniture, doors, windows, agricultural implements, etc

AT Newark, N. J., a few days ago, Mrs. Elinor Williams, wife of Rev. W. H. SEVERE storms of wind, rain and lightning visited a wide extent of country in the Eastern States, on the morning of the 8th. At Wallingford, Conn., a brick school-house, Catholic Church and forty dwellings and a large number of barns were demolished by the wind, and thirty persons were either killed outright or fatally wounded, and a number of others were more or less injured. The damage to property was estimated at $100,000. Severe thunder-storms were experienced at various points in Massachusetts and many persons were killed by lightning. The storm extended throughout portions of New York, New Hampshire, doing great damage to buildings, fences and stock.

A CORONER'S investigation into the causes of the late railroad accident at Mingo Junction, Ohio, was begun, on the 9th. Conductor Sterling, of the freight train, had been placed under arrest and committed to Jail, in default of $5,000 bail, on a charge of manslaughter.

THE machinists, blacksmiths and boiler-makers employed in Milwaukee by the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad were emphatically locked out, on the 12th, because of a disinclination to accept reduced pay. PERSONAL AND POLITICAL.

THE Louisiana State Democratic Convention met at Baton Rouge, on the 6th, and adopted a platform indorsing the lower system, the Nicholls Government, the State Funding law and the Congressional Investigating Committee; demanding Government aid for the Texas Pacific Railway and the Brazilian Steamship Line; expressing sympathy for the laboring classes; advocating the abolition of National Banks and the substitution of greenbacks for National Bank notes, the same to be a full legal tender for all debts, public and private, etc., etc. Four men who offered to split their votes were expelled from the Convention. E. A. Burke was nominated for State Treasurer.

C., on the 8th, a demand was made by the United States Marshal and the Sheriff for the surrender to the custody of the United States Court of the three Internal Revenue officers—Kuse, Durham and Moore—under indictment for the killing of an employe of an illicit distillery who, it is said, was offering resistance to the officers when in the discharge of their duties. The Sheriff refused to release the prisoners himself, but quietly permitted the Marshal to secure the keys. The latter thereupon released the prisoners, and at once looked them up again, thus satisfying the writ of habeas corpus, and placing the prisoners in the jurisdiction of the Federal Court.

THE South Carolina State Republican Convention met at Columbia, on the 8th. The ninth article of the platform which was adopted reads as follows: "We deem it inexpedient to nominate a candidate for Governor and other State officers because, owing to the condition of affairs in this State, occasioned by ridiculous and two years of Democratic supremacy, it is impossible for Republican voters in many counties—without incurring great personal danger—to exercise the right of suffrage or to vote at the election when held."

This, with other amounts of a like nature, makes a total deficit of over $500,000, in addition to the amounts lost by the failure of the National Bank of the State of Missouri and the Mastin Bank. The Treasurer's bond is said to be practically worthless. The Post's authority for these statements is not given.

A Few Words on Female Education.

Give your daughters a thorough education. Teach them to prepare a nourishing diet. Teach them to wash, to iron, to darn stockings, to sew on buttons, to make their own gowns. Teach them to bake bread, and that a good kitchen lessens the apothecary's account. Teach them that one dollar in one hundred cents, that one only lays up money whose expenses are less than his income, and that all grow poor who have to spend more than they receive. Teach them that a calico dress paid for, its better than a silken one unpaid for. Teach them that a full, healthy face displays a greater lustre than fity consumptive beauties. Teach them to wear strong shoes. Teach them to purchase, and to see that the account corresponds with the purchase. Teach girls they rank good housewifery in wearing strong bodices. Teach them good common sense, self-trust, self-help and industry. Teach them that an honest mechanic in his working dress is a better object of our esteem than a dozen haughty, finely-dressed fellows. Teach them gardening and the pleasures of Nature. Teach them, if you can afford it, music, painting and all other arts, but consider these as secondary objects only. Teach them a walk is more salutary than a ride in a carriage, and that wild flowers are a worthy object of admiration. Teach them to reject with disdain all appearances, and to use only yes or no in good earnest. Teach them that the happiness of matrimony depends neither on external appearance nor on wealth, but on the man's character. Have you instructed your daughters in these principles, and have they comprehended these principles? Fearlessly show them to marry; they will make their way through the world.—Practical Teacher.

WHAT A STOPPED WATCH DID.

Mingo Junction, a straggling village of fifteen or twenty houses, is situated on the Ohio River, just below the mouth of Cross Creek, and about four miles west from Steubenville, Ohio. Three years ago it was the scene of a frightful railroad accident, in which J. Mc. Cullough, General Manager of the Pennsylvania Railroad, and several others, lost their lives. A year later another smashup occurred, within a few rods of the former one, which sent half a dozen mangled and bleeding victims to their graves. Another horror was added to the list this morning, far surpassing either of the preceding in the number of killed and injured. Most of the victims were English and German immigrants who were on their way to the West.

The fatal shock took place just before daybreak. A dense fog prevailed at the time, which doubtless in a large degree added to the misery of the situation. The cause of the calamity is attributed to Sterling, conductor of the freight train, who acknowledges that his watch stopped twenty minutes before the train reached Mingo Junction, and that he caused an error in his calculation of time, and different meanings of the word "engine" to become. Another believes the cause of the accident to be the fog. Be that as it may, the collision and consequent loss of life, together with the destruction of property, is fearful. Over 20 persons are known to be killed outright, and at least fifty more injured. Of these, a large number will die. Besides the loss of human life, the property destroyed is estimated at $100,000. Among the killed are the following: T. O. Graham, Third Clerk on the Fast Line, of Cincinnati; Wm. Rodgers, Assistant Baggage Master, Cincinnati; August Andrews, Local Mail Agent on the mail car, Chicago; W. Va.; Mrs. Anna Cullen, of Bridgeport, Ohio, and her daughter Inlee and grand-daughter were badly injured; Patrick Gannon, Barnes Hill, Jefferson county, Pa.; Bernard Miller, an emigrant from Bremen, Germany; an unknown woman, large, fleshy and with the appearance of being a German; Paul Brose, Bremen; Bernard John Carey, Tyrone, Ireland; an unknown woman, apparently Irish; address of Miss Pindle, No. 353 Sheridan street, Allegheny; an unknown German, with a ticket from New York to Cincinnati; John Dugan, engineer of the Cincinnati Express; Mary McDonald, London, Eng.

THE LABOR INVESTIGATION.

GEORGE E. MCNEILL, President of the International Workingmen's Union, residing at Boston, Mass., has issued the first wiligram on the 6th. The whole difficulty, in his opinion, is the wages system of labor, or, in other words, that the employer owns and the slaver employs are contemporaneous, and that the productive power of labor is greater than consumption. As a remedy he suggests that throughout the country, instead of lending hundreds of millions of dollars as soon as asked for, the Government should lend some few hundred millions free of interest to the workingmen, for the purpose of getting control of the Government, and to loan any sum not to exceed $5,000 to build a home with, and to be paid back by installments.

He is also in favor of abolishing the United States Senate, restricting the powers of Congress and the Federal Judiciary, and in fact, curtailing both of labor to six, and allowing the Senate to meet only when the House should so decree. Another believes the cause of the depression to be the enormous amount of taxation consequence caused by the short period of issue of the greenbacks, and a third that the action sought is by Republicans, to avoid violence anticipated from the large mass of unemployed men, and to get them into employment on the eve of the Presidential election. Another believes that the whole trouble is caused by the fact that the Democrats have control of the House of Representatives, and will not grant the appropriations necessary for the support of the army, and that Republicans are trying to get the people to petition Congress to grant the appropriations. Another believes that the whole trouble is caused by the fact that the Democrats have control of the House of Representatives, and will not grant the appropriations necessary for the support of the army, and that Republicans are trying to get the people to petition Congress to grant the appropriations. QUESTIONS TO THE PUBLIC.

Mr. Hewitt has the following questions, which the Committee submit to the public:

The Committee of Congress appointed recently to investigate the causes of the present depression of business, and to suggest remedies for relief, invites the public to aid their investigations by answering the following questions:

1. What were the selling prices of your products in 1860, and in each subsequent year down to 1878, inclusive?

2. What were the wages paid by you in each of those years for labor employed?

3. Where the persons furnishing information are willing to do so, the Committee invites them to state the percentage of profits upon the investment; and the half-satisfied, wholly mystified Spaniard let him go on his way, showering silent blessings on his tailor's head.

An unemployed actor, disinclined to rust in idleness, to say nothing of starving, determined to "do the Provinces" as an entertainer. They did not prove the happy hunting grounds he expected, and when he arrived at a small town in the north, his funds and spirits were equally low. The latter were not raised by the worthy who had the letting of the "hall" informing him a theatrical exhibition would be "an guide at a" three; but that if he gave a lecture on chemistry the place would be crowded. At this straw our desperate actor clutched. He would turn a scientific lecturer, and chance it being discovered that he knew nothing of his subject. The hall was engaged, the bills distributed, his last coppers spent upon red-fire, brick-dust, iron-filings and sore innocent powders; the time came, and the lecturer stood before a crowded audience, without any clear idea of what he was to say or do save that he was going to perform the old experiment of producing hydrogen, and a new one of his own invention, which he hoped would bring the performance to a sudden end. The first experiment went off without a hitch. Mine. Thierret, with many improvements in the method of working the apparatus, then proceeded to explain the dangerous nature of chemicals, dwelt on gun-cotton, sudden death of experimentalists by fumes, etc., meanwhile filling my mentor with dark dread and other harmless ingredients. Having worked the audience up to the required pitch of nervousness, I dilated on the dangerous and destructive nature of the compound I was mixing. I spoke of my bed health, and wound up by saying: "Trusting all present will pass the same announcement may seem, it is nevertheless true, that were I to lose all stirring this mixture for one single second the whole of this building, and with it, said, on my honor as a gentleman, he should never be one of my Ministers again. I am sure you will agree with me that I cannot do what I said on my honor as a gentleman I would not do." Another man would have been silenced; but the great actor was always equal to an emergency, replied: "Gentlemen, sir, but I don't agree with you at all. Your honor, sir, is of small moment. The bold assertion startled the King; but the Duke went on: "Your Majesty is not a gentleman, but the sovereign of England, with duties to your people far above any to yourself, and these duties render it impossible that you can employ the abilities of Mr. Cauning."

"Well, Arthur," said the King, drawing a long breath, "if I must, I must."

Although he did not like being told he was not a gentleman, George IV. had once at least, while Regent, known when he was one. That was when he flung a glass of wine in Col. Hanlyn's face, with: "Hanlyn, you are a fool and a coward!" The insulted officer could not return the compliment without committing something like treason; it was out of the question to challenge the Prince; while to let the insult pass unnoticed was equally impossible. The Colonel filled his glass and threw the contents in the face of his neighbor, saying, "His Royal Highness' toast: pass it on!" "Hanlyn," cried the Regent, "you're a capital fellow! Here's your health!" And they were fast friends from that evening.

A Scotswoman, whose betrothed had gone to seek a better fortune in America, under promise to send for her as soon as he had climbed able to support a wife, after patiently waiting a few years, grew sick of hope deferred and took up with another sweetheart. She was no sooner fairly on with the new love when a letter arrived from the old one, inclosing money to pay her passage to him. In a terrible dilemma; but the doubly-plighted damsel's mother found a way out of the difficulty. She sent her second daughter in her sister's place. "The ugly girls," said she, "are as like as two blades of grass, and it will be all the one to him when he gets for his wife." For the sake of all parties, it is hoped the cheated man was as easily victimized as the Spaniard who stopped a correspondent of an English newspaper, attempting to cross the Republican lines, during the civil war of 1874, with a letter for the passport—a non-existent document. "Specials" are not readily prevented going where they have a mind to go, and the demand was met by the production of a fashionable tailor's bill, bearing the arms of sundry royal and imperial patrons on its face, and duly stamped and receipted. A pretty pantomime performance ensued, the journalist trying to impress upon the official mind that the figures in the account represented his personal measures, set down for the purpose of identification; and, having succeeded in that, he pointed triumphantly to the stamp and the signature across it, as irrefragable proof of the official character of the document

New York, Aug. 23, 1878.

EDITOR SENTINEL:

New York is shortly to have the privilege of listening to the voice of Dennis Kearney. It says the Occident sends greeting to the Orient, and will instruct it in the ways of—San Francisco. The Hoodlum must prevail. Everybody who is not with us must stand aside. And in good sooth with the 2:c0 trend that is slumbering in the socialistic, communistic, spiritualistic elements, this same Dennis Kearney is a man whose presence looks no good. He would fan the elements of discontent into a conflagration that would sweep the land, having in its train the torch of the incendiary, and the knife of the assassin. There is no argument in his sayings. He appeals only to the worst passions. Reason has no part in his programme. Whatever stands between him and his aims must perish. It would appear as though he is the special element in one of these great cyclone of disaster and revolution that for some purpose Heaven allowed periodically to sweep over every land.

Something more practical, and bearing in its bosom the germ of common sense, and a return to prosperity is the meeting of the Bankers' Association, held at Saratoga, lately. The gentlemen who compose this association are a guarantee that even if no immediate good should follow their deliberations, no harm will be done, and the airing of views may suggest practical means for relieving the country of its embarrassment. The Business Committee have already sent out 110,000 sealed letters and $10,000 circulars and printed papers, containing suggestions as to the proper means of arriving at a resumption of specie payments among those who give their views as to the best measures in their opinion to be taken, were O. C. Hale, cashier of the State National Bank of Keokuk; J. D. Hayes of Detroit; George Walker, President Charles B. Hall of Boston, and others. Among the more prominent gentlemen present were Messrs. B. P. Rhoam of Philadelphia; B. B. Sherman of New York; David A. Wells and Geo. A. Baller of New Haven, Halsey Williams of Pittsburgh; G. C. Barrett of Louisville, and Mr. Terre of Honesdale.

The proposed reforms so positively promised by the reformers when they secured their present official positions in the city government, have never been in any manner carried out, and to-day we occupy the anomalous position of a thoroughly reformed city badly in need of reformation. A reference to the files of the city papers will show that never before was crime so rampant, so bold and apparently so seldom punished as at this time, and it is an open secret that, at least some of the police department are in open collusion with the thieves. Take for instance the King robbery in Vesey street, mentioned last week. Those who are most familiar with the surroundings of the case, say openly that the police authorities could have recovered the stolen money and bonds before this, but that they are not satisfied with the reward, which is $5,000, for the recovery of $300,000. It is plain to be seen that the police and detectives are on the best possible terms with the very class against whose depredations they are employed to watch.

Edison is not the only wonderfully inventive genius the world possesses. Another scientific phenomenon has come to the surface in the person of a Mr. James Grasham, who not only proposes to take the photograph of an individual, or a ship, or other object from 500 to 5,000 miles distant, but will also furnish the exact latitude and longitude of the object. So you see, that should any vessel be derelict hereafter, all that is necessary is to call upon Mr. Grasham, and he will give her whereabouts and condition in a jiffy.

The method proposed by Mr. Grasham or rather the principle involved, is as old as the eternal hills, and the only wonder is that it has not been thought of before. The story of the spectre of the Brocken is familiar to every child, and even the oldest inhabitant remembers having read of that ghost by his early youth. Mr. Grasham's method is to produce an artificial mirage, and the thing is done. The way it was discovered was this: A little [illegible] while preparing asphalt for the roofing of a house, the cauldron was upset, and contents taking fire, sent an immense mass of dense black smoke rolling heavenward. Suddenly a sunbeam shot through the dense cloud, and looking up he saw distinctly a brig which was lying at Hunter's Point, and which was on fire. He plainly saw the men throwing water on the fire, saw the boats, saw gangs of men at work cutting off lines from adjacent steamers, and every surrounding, just as distinctly as though he were on the spot. He immediately went to work, and has demonstrated to his own satisfaction at least, that an artificial mirage can be produced which will reproduce objects a few miles distant. The same can be effected on a larger scale, by means of which objects at any given distance can be photographed.

The New York Custom House is again quiet. At the time of the change in Collectorships, I referred to the untruth the transfer occasioned. This excitement has died away. Gen. Merritt accepted the position with the intention of reorganizing the Custom House on a business basis—just as a clear headed manager would control the outgoings and incomings of any large merchantile establishment. Collector Merritt has all the elements necessary for popularity. He has no ringing noble lower sanctum, but opens his door to receive any comers. Merchants appreciate this, and already the business men of New York heartily endorse the new Collector. There ought not to be any nuisance in Congress next winter to interfere with the confirmation of such a man as Gen. Merritt.

It is a well recognized fallacy to pooh-pooh the physical achievements of these days, and to intimate generally that our strong men now are only pigmies beside the giants of a few generations back. Did I would like to ask of such scoffers at nineteenth century development who in—history was ever known to swim eighteen miles without stopping. That is what a Bowery photographer named Dinmarcs accomplished on Monday last. Having previously made a good record as a swimmer, Dinmers challenged any man in the world to swim with him from Harlem Bridge to the northern extremity of Manhattan Island down through the East River and across New York Bay to Stanton Island, the whole distance being as stated, eighteen miles. This challenge was accepted by a professional swimmer named Tuelf, and at quarter past ten Monday morning the two men took simultaneous "headers" from Harlem Bridge into the water. Shortly after passing the Battery Tuelf was taken with cramps and had to be hauled into his attendant's boat while Dinmers kept on at full speed landing on Staten Island after a trip of five hours and a half, and thereby winning $500 and the title of "Champion Long Distance Swimmer of the United States"—a more formidable title, in point of size at least, than the President's.

Mention has been made of the schemes devised by certain men, to ameliorate the condition of the suffering poor who are crowding the large cities, and who are now and have for a long time been out of employment. A wealthy philanthropist of this city has purchased 1,000 acres of land in a Western State, which has subdivided into tracts of 40 acres each. He is taking poor families of known good character, and is transporting them to, and locating them upon this land, the only condition being that they will not only abstain from the use of liquors themselves, but will prevent its being sold in the colony. Some gentlemen of influence are urging up the general government to furnish transportation to poor families to the unoccupied lands in the West; furnish them with seeds, farming utensils and stock, and when they shall have repaid the actual cash outlay, advanced to them without interest, a title to the land shall be given them for a homestead of 160 acres. This land will then be taxable, and be a source of revenue to the government.

RADIX.

An Undeniable Truth.

You deserve to suffer, and if you lead a miserable, unsatisfactory life in this beautiful world, it is entirely your own fault and there is only one excuse for you,—your unreasonable prejudice and skepticism, which has killed thousands. Personal knowledge and common sense reasoning will soon show you that Green's August Flower will cure you of Liver Complaint, or Dyspepsia, with all its miserable effects such as sick headache, palpitation of the heart, sour stomach, habitual costiveness, dizziness of the head, nervous prostration, low spirits, &c. Its sales now reach every town on the Western Continent and not a Druggist but will tell you of its wonderful cures. You can buy a Sample Bottle for 10 cents. Three doses will relieve you.

The Decision of Secy Schurz.

THE supervision and general oversight of the public lands of the United States are assigned to the Department of the Interior; and it is made the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to see to it that all the laws relating thereto are duly executed. Acting in this character and under the powers of his office, Secy Schurz has recently made a decision which, in its principle, applies to all the unsold lands of the Central Pacific, the Union Pacific, the Kansas Pacific and the Denver Pacific Railroad Companies, amounting, in the aggregate, to nearly twenty-nine millions of acres. The effect of this decision, if ultimately sustained, is to open these lands to settlement and pre-emption, under the Pre-emption laws of the United States, at the Government price, which is $1.25 per acre.

The particular application of the decision relates to the land grant made to the Kansas Pacific Railroad Company, or rather to the company to whose rights it has succeeded. The third section of the act making the grant provides "that there be and is hereby granted to the said company * * * every alternate section of public lands," etc., * * * subject to the condition that "all such lands so granted by this section which shall not be sold or disposed of by said company within three years after the entire road shall have been completed, shall be subject to settlement and pre-emption, like other lands, at a price not exceeding one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, to be paid to said company." This road was completed and accepted by the President, in 1872. The decision of Secy Schurz is that the lands remaining unsold after three years thereafter are, under the provision of this section, open to settlement and purchase, under the Pre-emption laws of the United States, and at the price named, the proceeds from any such sales to be paid over to the company. The Secretary's theory is not that the lands granted and remaining unsold after the time specified revert back to the Government; but that the Government has the right to sell them to pre-emptors, like any public lands, at the price named. The provision, as he holds, was wisely designed to prevent the company from refusing to sell the lands except at exorbitant prices, and enable the Government, after the lapse of three years from the completion of the road, to place the unsold portion of these lands on the basis, as to sale, as that which applies to public lands generally.

The whole question turns upon the construction of the phrase "which shall not be sold or disposed of by said company." Secy Schurz treats the words "disposed of" as simply equivalent to the word "sold;" and if he is correct in this particular then his decision is clearly right. It was the intention of Congress that the lands remaining unsold by the company after the lapse of three years from the completion of the road should, as to the right of settlement and purchase, come under the operation of the Pre-emption laws of the United States, and that the company should not retain the exclusive right of sale against these laws. Such is the position taken by Secy Schurz.

The Secretary has been both sharply criticised and warmly commended for this decision. Those who have criticised him take the ground that the words "or disposed of by said company" refer to some other disposition of these lands than that of actual sale, and, hence, are not the equivalent of the word "sold" which immediately precedes them. They claim that mortgaging the lands to secure borrowed money is disposing of them within the meaning of the law, and that, inasmuch as all these lands are thus mortgaged, they are "disposed of" in the sense contemplated by the law; and, hence, are not subject, any more than lands actually sold, to the Pre-emption laws of the United States. They are covered by a mortgage duly executed, and, therefore, subject to the legal and equitable rights of the mortgagees. It must be confessed that there is force and plausibility in this view of the case.

It is hardly to be supposed that a question of so much importance and involving so many interests will be left to rest simply on the decision of Secy Schurz. It will, doubtless, in some form, reach the Supreme Court of the United States, for final determination. N. Y. Independent.

Speaking of this decision of Secy Schurz, the Chicago Tribune says it will open to private purchase about 28,000,000 acres of land at $1.25 per acre. The Tribune then gives an abstract of the present land laws of the country, and says:

From these particulars it will be seen that any settler may pre-empt any portion of the public land to the extent of 160 acres of land held at $1.25 an acre, or eighty acres held at $2.50 per acre, and pay for the same, without interest, at the end of thirty-three months after taking possession.

Or, under Home-stead law, every adult may enter 160 acres of $1.25 land, or eighty acres of $2.50 land, without cost, on the condition of cultivating and occupying the same five years.

Or a soldier, or the widow of a soldier, or the minor children of a soldier can enter 160 acres of either description of land, and have the term of service in the army deducted from the five years' settlement or cultivation. Land can be entered for homesteads by a duly appointed agent. Lands acquired under the Home-stead law are not liable for debts incurred previously.

The objection is urged that there is no land now open for settlement under these laws, and that all the good lands have been taken up. This is not true. The Tribune then goes on to show that there are nearly 17,000,000 acres of public lands in Kansas alone, open under the Homestead law, in farms of 160 acres, free of cost, or open under private entry at $1.25 per acre for cash, or under pre-emption, in farms of 160 acres, at $1.25 per acre with thirty-three months' credit without interest. In addition, there are 3,000,000 acres of State lands for sale on ten years' time, and 4,500,000 acres of railroad land on eleven years' time. All this is in the one State of Kansas. In Nebraska, Minnesota and Dakota, the lands of all kinds—railroad, State and public lands—are even of greater extent, and, for the most part, all capable of immediate cultivation, easy of access, with facilities of travel, transportation and postal and telegraph services wholly unknown to the people yet living who filled up Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin, Iowa and Missouri. Dakota is twice the size of Minnesota and as large as Illinois, Indiana and Wisconsin. Kansas is twice as large as Indiana, and Nebraska has about the same dimensions. In Kansas and Nebraska there are many counties not yet settled to any extent, and where colonies or organizations of six, ten or twenty families migrate together they can have their lands selected by an agent for them in one body, thus forming a community, and if they purchase the land from the railroads, or from the State, can secure the most liberal terms and long credit, or if they take under the Pre-emption laws, each will have thirty-three months' time in which to pay for the land, or if they take under the Homestead law, can be of mutual assistance in the way of labor and means until they can begin to produce. In all such cases the larger the number moving together the greater aid they will be to each other, the better terms they can make; but in every case they ought to have their land selected by a trusted agent beforehand, and then move directly to it. Wherever there are men wanting land, with the intention of laboring thereon, the land is abundant, easily reached, obtainable on favorable terms, and in every case only equired by those who will find liberal hands prompt to help them on their way.

Old Drinking Cups and Customs.

Drinking from the same cup by several individuals is an old custom which is still kept alive in Italy and in all parts of Germany, and is not unknown in England among those classes who are lovers of malt liquor and drink it "from the pewter." When a friend meets another in a coffee-house or tavern, the man who has already ordered something does not issue a second order for his friend, but bobbs out the vessel for the newcomer. The German krug and the English pewter mug still show the popular feeling in favor of one large vessel for a friendly party. The formula of Saxon politeness which consisted in two drinkers emptying the same vessel is well known. The first who drank said Wes hail (Here's health to you), and the one who received the goblet, before emptying it, said Drink hail (I drink your health). From the "Roman de Rou," it appears that this was customary among the English as far back as the twelfth century. There were hanaps mounted on one foot, in the form of a shalice, others were mounted on three feet, and others still were made in the form of a bowl or cup. Some were made with covers, others without, and the materials employed in their construction were as varied as their shapes. The hanap was particularly used by persons of high social position; the flankard, with handle, being the more popular vessel. And such was the fear of poison in the early morning and in certain states of the weather hangs over a flock of sheep or a herd of fine? The column of mold or something through the branches of the tree toward the clouds offers, in consequence of the comparatively high conductivity of water, favorable passage for the electricity. A herd of cattle under an isolated tree is thus exposed to a double risk; also, it is evident that those animals are in the open country less secure from injury than human beings, who cannot affect the atmosphere in a like degree.—Chambers' Journal.

Danger From Lightning.

Under what conditions is damage from lightning incurred, and what are the means by which the risk can be lessened or avoided? An isolated tree, standing either upon a wide plain or upon an eminence, is obviously likely to determine a lightning discharge, to "attract the lightning," to use a common expression. The top of the tree is the nearest point to the cloud, and since the tree is a better conductor than the air, a line drawn vertically through it to the cloud meets the shortest and easiest course along which the electricities may pass. If, when the charged cloud arrives directly over this point, the extension is sufficient to overcome the resistance along that line, a discharge will take place and the tree will be struck. But if the tension be not sufficient, the cloud will pass harmlessly over. Hence it appears that a person standing during a thunderstorm beneath a tree so situated is exposed to some risk. On no account, therefore, should the traveler take refuge under an isolated tree; generally he will do well to avoid its neighborhood altogether; but should he be overtaken by the storm while on a plain, with no shelter near, the tree may still be made to afford him some protection. If he take up a position near it, but not under the branches, he will probably escape unhurt should the lightning descend upon it. The safest distance from the tree is that which is equal to its height. To approach much nearer than this is to incur the risk of being within the influence of the stroke; to remain at a much greater distance away is to place one's self in the same conditions of isolation as the tree itself. It will have been remarked by all observers of the phenomenon that whenever a tree has been struck by lightning it has generally occupied an isolated position. In describing the position as one of isolation, however, it is not meant that the tree is necessarily standing alone, but that it is not one of a numerous group. When these are united or massed together, their collective conductivity is often sufficient to cause an indestructive discharge of the electricity. This is especially likely to happen when the trees are wet with rain, for then their surfaces are covered with a film of water, which is a good conductor. For this reason, the danger from lightning is much less after rain has begun to fall, than before, when everything is dry. It appears, therefore, that the safest situation during a thunderstorm is in the midst of a wood, particularly if the roll call with the tallest trees be avoided. In such a place of shelter the traveler may take refuge in the thickest of the underwood, for he will there be effectually shielded from harm. The greatest risk of injury from lightning is undoubtedly incurred by persons traveling across a wide and very flat plain, because in such a situation they are the highest elevated objects. To lessen the risk, which may here be somewhat serious, advantage should be taken of whatever undulations of surface may exist, to keep upon the lowest ground. No doubt the prostrate position would in these circumstances afford greater security than the erect. It happens not unfrequently that animals are killed by lightning under a tree to which they had betaken themselves for shelter. In these cases the tree is struck partly in consequence of its isolation, and partly on account of the presence of the animals beneath it. Usually there are several, and often many of them associated together, huddled probably by terror into contact one with another. The air, heated by their bodies, rises above them laden with moisture, derived mainly from their breath. Who has not noticed the cloud of vapor that in the early morning and in certain states of the weather hangs over a flock of sheep or a herd of fine? The column of moist air ascending through the branches of the tree toward the clouds offers, in consequence of the comparatively high conductivity of water, favorable passage for the electricity. A herd of cattle under an isolated tree is thus exposed to a double risk; also, it is evident that those animals are in the open country less secure from injury than human beings, who cannot affect the atmosphere in a like degree.—Chambers' Journal.

Bijah's Words of Wisdom.

Bijah now devotes one hour per day to receiving calls from people in sorrow and distress and is used to sympathy and advice.

A little woman, with a sharp face and a long, chin nose was admitted. She had been weeping. There was a quiver to her thin as she folded her fan, and she sighed with a terrible dreariness as she took a chair and began: "Oh, Bijah, you see before you the wreck of a once happy wife."

"Once happy wife, but now perfectly reckless, even about new hats. I see, madam—proceed," he replied.

"My husband is out every night till almost midnight," she continued, as the tears came. "Once he called me darling; now he refers to me as Sarah Jane. Once he patted my head and praised me; now I can't come near him but he wants to know if I have been eating onions again. It has been growing on him for a whole year, and today I am the saddest woman in Detroit. What shall I do—what can I do?"

He solemnly picked up the dictionary, looked under the head of "S," for a few minutes, and closing the book leaned back and said: "Madam, I find nothing in Noah Webster's writings bearing on your case, but I think I see the remedy. When you go home give the house a good sweeping, and don't leave any apple cores or baseball clubs in the corners. Then put on a tidy dress, pin a clean collar around your neck, shine up your ear-rings, tie on a nice white apron, and as you hear the old boy coming up the path to-night strike up a lively song and give him the biggest smile you can and not increase the size of your mouth. That's my remedy, madam, and if you'll try it I'll bet you a wooden leg against a paper of pins that he'll light his pipe after supper, take a seat beside you on the porch and start out with pet names containing four syllables."

She was red in the face as she passed, but she remembered that she had only two hair-pins in her head, one shoe was unlied, and there were three grease spots on her dress in plain sight, and she cooled her temper, and said: "Maybe it is my fault, and I'll follow your advice."

"Do, madam. Nothing so discourages a husband as to come home at night and find an old corset under the table, a dog collar and a bear-trap on the lounge, and a slip-shod wife limping across the kitchen floor, a needle in one hand and the biscuit-pan in the other, and wishing some peddler would come along with cinnamon essence. Good-day, madam—can't back it if it doesn't work."—Detroit Free Press.

Daring Speculators.

The fascination of the Stock Exchange is constantly leading men to abandon safe employments and to engage in some the rapid way of getting rich. This class cannot be made to understand that whatever is cleared in Wall street is at the equal loss of another. That there is a retribution of very certain character following in the track of Wall street sharks. Robert is a permanent feature in the history of the street. This is shown by the fact that the very sharpest men eventually present the most bitters. The most brilliant gains, indeed, turn to loss in the moment when hope is looking for its fruition. Perhaps the last of all high-flyers in which New York is capable might be included in the narrow precinct of the Stock Exchange. Among the names on the list of "lame ducks" is that of H. J. Fowler, who has been one of the most active operators of the present day. For six years he had been alternating amid tremendous fluctuations. At one time he had a long run of success, and was elected to the dignity of a millionaire. Then luck took a change, and he began to lose. He could not stop, however, for he was in the hands of the infatuation of the speculator forbids it as long as a dollar is left. Fowler was the slave of chance, and he was driven to the bondage never ceased until his whole capital was gone. Probably if he had enough to try another chance, he would again be found in the speculating crowd. Another instance is found in Ableu B. Stockwell, who, for a time, made a powerful sensation in Wall street. He operated boldly in Pacific Mail and other fancies, and was at the same time a principal agent in the sale of sewing-machine stock. He was in the midst of a magnificent career, when suddenly the whole structure of his speculations fell to the ground, and he was left penniless. The following year he was found in the Brazos River, Tex., was bitten by a wolf. The latter animal acted very strangely at the time, coming in from the prairie and attacking his muleship with his teeth, leading on till licked loose. The wolf was rabid, as was subsequently shown by the mule being himself taken with unmistakable symptoms of hydrophobia.

—While dressing to go to Wilkesbarre to witness a recent celebration, Rev. C. E. Fessenden, of Catawissa, dropped his pocknife, with the blade open, into his hand. Being in somewhat of a hurry, he did not notice where the knife fell, and when he pulled on his boot felt something cutting his foot. He drew off the boot. It so happened that the knife fell with the handle to the heel and the blade pointing to the toe, and, something like old Jemima's plaster, the more he pulled to get the boot off the more the knife cut his foot. Finally the boot was removed and he was found to be very seriously injured.—Catawissa (Pa.) News Item.

—A few days ago three boys, aged respectively eight, eleven and twelve, slipped into the house of Mr. Sterling Jenkins, who lives on the Talbotton road, and stole a watch and some other valuables. Mr. Jenkins tracked and overtook them in Hamilton. He recovered his property, but did not deem it sufficient to put them in Jail, so he told them that if they would whip each other he would not prosecute. This they agreed to do. They were taken out, stripped to the waist, and provided with stout hickory switches. One was tied to a tree, and the others took on his back lustily with the switches until Mr. Jenkins expressed himself satisfied. The ceremony was gone through with each one. They were then dispersed with smarting backs and penitent hearts. They will tell their mother worked in the mills here, and that their father was dead.—Talbotton (Ga.) Times.

—We learn that near the plantation of Mr. Turner a most singular scene occurred one day last week. A thirteen-foot alligator by a rattlesnake. It appears that his snakeship first saw the gator, when the latter was rolled up with his rattles, he attracted the latter's attention. Then began the charming process, which lasted fully half an hour. The gator at first moved his head twice or thrice, but was immediately called to order by the rattles of the snake. Toward the end of the half hour, with fixed eyes, the alligator moved slowly toward his terrible enemy, and with a sudden striking distance, when the snake curled himself more compactly, and with all the strength he could muster struck the alligator. For a moment the alligator shook tremendously, and then as if by magic made a semi-circle right backward movement peculiar to their 'gatorships and 'rought his tail down upon the would-be assassin with a force sufficient to cave in the

The Decision of Sec'y Schurz.

THE supervision and general oversight of the public lands of the United States are assigned to the Department of the Interior: and it is made the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to see to it that the laws relating thereto are duly executed. Acting in this character and under the powers of his office, Sec'y Schurz has recently made a decision which, in its principle, applies to all the unsold lands of the Central Pacific, the Union Pacific, the Kansas Pacific and the Denver Pacific Railroad Companies, amounting, in the aggregate, to nearly twenty-nine millions of acres. The effect of this decision, if ultimately sustained, is to open these lands to settlement and pre-emption, under the Pre-emption laws of the United States, at the Government price, which is $1.25 cents per acre.

The particular application of the decision relates to the land-grant made to the Kansas Pacific Railroad Company, or rather to the company to whose rights it has succeeded. The third section of the act making the grant provides "that there be and is hereby granted to the said company * * * every alternate section of public lands," etc., * * * subject to the condition that "all such lands so granted by this section which shall not be sold or disposed of by said company within three years after the entire road shall have been completed, shall be subject to settlement and pre-emption, like other lands, at a price not exceeding one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, to be paid to said company." The road was completed and accepted by the President, in 1872. The decision of Sec'y Schurz is that the lands remaining unsold after three years therefrom are, under the provision of this section, open to settlement and purchase, under the Pre-emption laws of the United States, and at the price named, the proceeds from any such sales to be paid over to the company. The Secretary's theory is not that the lands granted and remaining unsold after the time specified revert back to the Government; but that the Government has the right to sell them to pre-emptors, like any public lands, at the price named. The provision, as he holds, was clearly designed to prevent the company from refusing to sell the lands except at exorbitant prices, and enables the Government, after the lapse of three years from the completion of the road, to place the unsold portion of these lands on the basis, as to sale, as that which applies to public lands generally.

The whole question turns upon the construction of the phrase "which shall not be sold or disposed of by said company." Sec'y Schurz treats the words "disposed of" as simply equivalent to the word "sold;" and if he is correct in this particular then his decision is clearly right. It was the intention of Congress that the lands remaining unsold by the company after the lapse of three years from the completion of the road should, as to the character of settlement and purchase, come under the operation of the Pre-emption laws of the United States, and that the company should not retain the exclusive right of sale against those laws. Such is the position taken by Sec'y Schurz.

The Secretary has been both sharply criticised and warmly commended for this decision. Those who have criticised him take the ground that the words "or disposed of by said company" refer to some other disposition of these lands than that of actual sale, and, hence, are not the equivalent of the word "sold" which immediately precedes them. They claim that mortgaging the lands to secure borrowed money is disposing of them within the meaning of the law, and that, inasmuch as all these lands are thus mortgaged, they are "disposed of" in the sense contemplated by the law; and, hence, are not subject, any more than lands actually sold, to the Pre-emption laws of the United States. They are covered by a mortgage, duly executed, and, therefore, subject to the legal and equitable rights of the mortgagee. It may be contested that there is force and plausibility in this view of the case.

It is hardly to be supposed that a question of so much importance and involving so many interests will be left to rest simply on the decision of Sec'y Schurz. It will, doubtless, in some form, reach the Supreme Court of the United States, for final determination.

Speaking of this decision of Sec'y Schurz, the Chicago Tribune says it will open to private purchase about 28,000,000 acres of land at $1.25 per acre. The Tribune then gives an abstract of the present land laws of the country, and says:

From these particulars it will be seen that any adult person may pre-empt any portion of the public land to the extent of 160 acres of land held at $1.25 an acre, or eighty acres held at $2.50 per acre, and pay for the same, without interest, at the end of thirty-three months after taking possession.

Or, under the Homestead law, every adult may enter 160 acres of $1.25 land, or eighty acres of $2.50 land, without cost, on the condition of cultivating and occupying the same five years.

Or a soldier, or the widow of a soldier, or the minor children of a soldier can enter 160 acres of either description of land, and have the term of service in the army deducted from the five years' settlement or cultivation. Land may be entered by homesteads by a duly appointed agent. Lands acquired under the Homestead law are not liable for debts so contracted previously.

The objection is urged that there is no land now open for settlement under these laws, and that all the good lands have been taken up. This is not true. The Tribune then goes on to show that there are nearly 17,000,000 acres of public lands in Kansas alone, open under the Homestead law, in farms of 160 acres, free of cost, or open under private entry at $1.25 per acre for cash, or under pre-emption, in farms of 160 acres, at $1.25 per acre, with thirty-three months' credit without interest. In addition, there are 3,000,000 acres of State lands for sale on ten years' time, and 4,500,000 acres of railroad land on eleven years' time. All this is in the one State of Kansas. In Nebraska, Minnesota and Dakota, the lands of all kinds—railroad, State and public lands—are even of greater extent, and, for the most part, all capable of immediate cultivation, easy of access, with facilities of travel, transportation and postal and telegraph service wholly unknown to the people 20 years ago, who filled up Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin, Iowa and Missouri. Dakota is twice the size of Minnesota, and as large as Illinois, Indiana and Wisconsin. Kansas is twice as large as Indiana, and Nebraska has about the same dimensions. In Kansas and Nebraska there are many counties not yet settled to any extent, and where twenty families migrate together they can have their lands selected by an agent for them in one body, thus forming a community, and if they purchase the land from the railroads, or from the State, can secure the most liberal credit and long credit, or if they take under the Pre-emption laws, each will have thirty-three months' time in which to pay for the land, or if they take under the Homestead law, can be of mutual assistance in the way of labor and means until they can begin to produce. In all such cases the larger the number moving together the greater will they will be to each other, the better terms they can make; but in every case they ought to leave their land selected by a trusted agent beforehand, and then move directly to it. Wherever there are men wanting land, with the intention of laboring thereon, the land is abundant, easily reached, obtainable by settlement or purchase, and in every way will find liberal hands prompt to help them on their way.

Old Drinking Cups and Customs.

Drinking from the same cup by several individuals is a no old custom which is still kept alive in Italy and in all parts of Germany, and is not unknown in England among those classes which are lovers of malt liquor and drink it "from the pewter." When a friend meets another in a coffee-house or tavern, the one who has already ordered something does not issue a second order for his friend, but holds out the vessel for the newcomer. The German krug and the English pewter mug still show the popular feeling in favor of one large vessel for a friendly party. The formula of Saxon politeness which consisted in two drinkers employing the same vessel is well known. The first who drank said Ich bell (Here's health to you), and the one who received the goblet, before emptying it, said Drink bell (I drink your health). From the "Roman de Rou," it appears that this was customary among the English as late as the fourth century. There were hanaps mounted on one foot, in the form of a chalice, others were mounted on three feet, and others still were made in the form of a bowl or cup. Some were made with covers, others without, and the materials employed in their construction were as varied as their shapes. The hanap was particularly used by persons of high social position; the tankard, with handle, being the more popular vessel. And such was the fear of poison in the Middle Ages, that a great personage was served from a hanap with a cover which could be used as a vessel, from which cover the servant drank a little of the liquor, which he poured from the goblet for that purpose. These precautions clearly proved insufficient, and preservatives against poisoning were sought after under the most absurd prejudices. The fabulous animal known as the unicorn or licorne was thought to be the enemy of everything impure. People fancied that by causing their beverages to be served them in vases made of the horn of the unicorn, they could easily detect the presence of poison in their drink. Handles were made, as they thought, of this material for knives; for it was said that blood would exude from horn and lose of the licorne, when brought in contact with poisoned meats. The long sword of the narwhal, when brought to Europe, was thought to be the horn of the unicorn, and it is probable that fossil ivory of many kinds was also sold under the same name. Well-appointed houses possessed a large number of hanaps. The inventory, engrossed in 1360, of the household of Charles V. of France, surnamed the Wise, describes four gold hanaps and as many ewers, weighing in all nearly ninety-six marcs, and 177 tankards of gilded silver, nearly all enameled and weighing in the aggregate 503 marcs of silver. Some of these vessels were provided with air-tight covers, as they were intended to be carried about with already prepared drinks. Among northern Nations they were sometimes made of maple-wood, and beautifully carved.—Scribner's Monthly.

Danger From Lightning.

Under what conditions is damage from lightning powerless, and what are the means by which the risk can be lessened or avoided? An isolated tree, standing either upon a wide plain or upon an eminence, is obviously likely to determine a lightning discharge, to "attract the lightning," to use a common expression. The top of the tree is the nearest point to the cloud, and since the tree is a better conductor than the air, a line drawn vertically through it to the cloud marks the shortest and easiest course along which the electricities may pass. If, when the charged cloud arrives directly over this point, the extension is sufficient to overcome the resistance along that line, a discharge will take place and the tree will be struck. But if the tension be not sufficient, the cloud will pass harmlessly over. Hence it appears that a person standing during a thunder-storm beneath a tree so situated is exposed to some risk. On no account, therefore, should the traveler take refuge under an isolated tree; generally he will do well to avoid its neighborhood altogether; but should he be overtaken by the storm when in the plain, with no shelter near, the tree may still be made to afford him some protection if he take up a position near it, but not under its branches, he will probably escape unhurt should the lightning descend upon it. The distance from which the tree is that which is equal to its height. To approach much nearer than this is to incur the risk of being within the influence of the stroke; to remain at a much greater distance away is to place one's self in the same conditions of location as the tree itself. It will have been remarked by all observers of the phenomenon that whenever a tree has been struck by lightning it has generally occupied an isolated position. In describing the rending as one of isolation, however, it is not meant that the tree is necessarily standing alone, but that it is not one of a numerous group. When there are many trees together, their collective conductivity is often sufficient to cause an inductive discharge of the surrounding. This is especially likely to happen when the trees are wet with rain, for then their surfaces are covered with a film of water, which is a good conductor. For this reason, the danger from lightning is much less after rain has begun to fall, than before, and in every case when dry. It appears, therefore, that the safest situation during a thunder-storm is in the midst of a wood, peculiarly if that wood or neighborhood of the tallest trees be avoided. In such a place or shelter the traveler may take refuge in the confidence that he will there be effectually shielded from harm. The greatest risk of injury from lightning is undoubtedly incurred by persons travelling across a wide and very flat plain, because in such a situation they are the only elevated objects. To lessen this risk, which may here be somewhat serious, advantage should be taken of whatever undulations of surface may exist, to keep upon the lowest ground. No doubt the prostrate position would be the most effectual for obtaining security than the erect. It happens not unfrequently that animals are killed by lightning under circumstances by which they had broaken themselves for shelter. In these cases the tree is struck partly in consequence of its location, and partly on account of the presence of the animals beneath it. Usually there are several, and often many of them assembled together, huddled probably by terror into contact one with another. The air, heated by their bodies, rises about them laden with moisture, derived mainly from their breath. Who has not noticed the cloud of vapor that in the early morning and in certain states of the weather hangs over a flock of sheep or a herd of kine? The column of moist air ascending through the branches of the tree toward the clouds offers, in consequence of the comparatively high conductivity of water, favorable passage for the electricity. A herd of cattle under an isolated tree is thus exposed to a double risk; also, it is evident that these animals are in the open country less secure from injury than human beings, who cannot affect the atmosphere in a like degree.—Chambers' Journal.

Rijah's Words of Wisdom.

Rijah now devotes one hour per day to receiving calls from people in sorrow and distress and in need of sympathy and advice.

A little woman, with a sharp face and a long, chin nose was admitted. She had been weeping. Her eyes were red as fire, so she folded her fan, and she sighed with a terrible dreariness as she took a chair and began: "Mr. Rijah, you see before you the wreck of a once happy wife."

"Once happy wife, but now perfectly reckless, even about new hats. I see, madam—proceed," he replied.

"My husband is out every night till almost midnight," she continued, as the tears came. "Once he called me darling; now he refers to me as Sarah Jane. Once he patted my head and praised me; now I can't come near him but he wants to know if I have been eating onions again. It has been growing on him for a whole year, and today I am the saddest woman in Detroit. What shall I do—what can I do?"

He sadly picked up the dictionary, looked under the head of "2" for a few minutes, and closing the book leaned back and said: "Madam, I find nothing in Noah Webster's writings bearing on your case, but I think I see the remedy. When you go home give the house a good sweeping, and don't leave any apple cores or baseball clubs in the corners. Then put on a tidy dress, pin a clean collar around your neck, shine up your ear-rings, tie on a nice white apron, and as your hour the old boy coming up the path to-night strike up a lively song and give him the biggest smile you can and not increase the size of your mouth. That's my remedy, madam, and if you'll try it I'll bet you a wooden leg against a pair of pins that he'll light his pipe after supper, take a seat beside you on the porch and start out with pet names containing four syllables."

She was red in the face as she paused, but she remembered that she had only two hairpins in her head, one shoe was untied, and there were three grease spots on her dress in plain sight, and she cooled her temper, and said: "Maybe it is my fault, and I'll follow your advice."

"Do, madam. Nothing so discourages a husband as to come home at night and find an old corset under the table, a dog collar and a bear-trap on the lounge, and a slip-shod wife lying around in dishabille with paper-butter in one hand and the biscuit-pan in the other, and wishing some peddler would come along with cannabis saccharine. Good-day, madam—come back if it doesn't work."—Detroit Free Press.

Daring Speculators.

The fascination of the Stock Exchange is constantly leading men to abandon regular business in order to engage in the rapid way of getting rich. This class cannot be made to understand that whatever is created in Wall street is at the equal loss of another. That there is a retribution of very certain character following in the track of Wall street stock jobbers is a permanent feature in the history of the street. This is shown by the fact that the very sharpest men eventually prove the worst bitten. It must brilliant gains, indeed, turn to loss in the moment when hope is leading for its fruition. Perhaps the saddest of all stories of which New York is capable might be included in the narrow precinct of the Stock Exchange. Among the names of recent names on the list of "lame ducks" is that of H. J. Fowler, who has been one of the most active operators of the present day. For six years he had been alternating amid tremendous fluctuations. At one time he had a long run of success, and was chosen to the dignity of a millionaire. Then luck took a change, and he began to lose. He could not stop, however. The rollers were too steep, and recently his assets have been sold at auction for the benefit of his creditors. The list illustrates the usual style. Twenty thousand shares of fancy stock of various names and patterns sold in different lots for an aggregate of $32, which, small as it may seem, is more than they are worth.—*N. Y. Cor. Fighting Flames in a Coal-Mine.

A woman driven from other habitations made her home in an otherwise unused drift of Butler colliery, near Pittston, Pa. The fire by which she cooked her meals spread to the mine fully a year and a half ago. The mine was so situated that water could not be introduced to flood it, nor was smothering by steam successful. The fire threatened to extend to mines of the Pennsylvania and Delaware and Hudson Companies. Warned that it would be held accountable for damages, the Butler Company adopted a plan of isolating the fire. A deep trench, in the shape of a horseshoe, was dug around the fire, through layers of rock and coal, to the clay. A brick wall six feet thick filled this trench, and the fire is thus cut off from new fuel. It is estimated that fully 500,000 tons of coal have been consumed in this burning fire in the mine. The Town of Pittston would in time have been burned under but for the barriers. The land surface under which the fire has raged presents a picture of desolation. It is a barren, baked expanse, covering 150 acres. The completion of the wall of defense and safety naturally brings feelings of great joy to the people of Pittston and to all others interested. Hereafter abandoned coal tunnels will have to be recklessly given over to horsekeeping purposes.—Utica (N. Y.) Herald.

—The death of Judge Shepley, of Maine, will seriously inconvenience many patent owners, for he had heard many of the important patent cases, including the fringe-mats of patents and involving large amounts of money, many of which he had held under advisement for months and even years. All these cases will have to be reargued before another Judge.

INCIDENTS AND ACCIDENTS.

—A little boy, in Baltimore, was literally pinched to death by the mother of one of his playmates, with whom he had quarreled. She pinched his arm so terribly that the swellings reached the shoulder, and eventually caused the lad's death.

—A few days ago, a smile used for plow-work on the Conner place, one of the largest cotton plantations on the Brazos River, Tex., was bitten by a wolf. The latter animal acted very strangely at the time, running in circles in the prairie and attacking his mulesship with his teeth, loading on all kicked base. The wolf was rabid, as was subsequently shown by the mule being himself taken with unmistakable symptoms of hydrophobia.

—While dressing to go to Wilkesbarre to witness a recent celebration, Rev. C. E. Fessenden, of Canawisse, dropped his penknife, with the blade open, into his leg. Being somewhat of a hurry, he did not notice where the knife fell, and when he pulled off his boot felt a sensation of something hip severely on the ball of the foot. It so happened that the knife fell with the handle to the heel and the point of the blade to the toe, and something like old Jemima's plaster, the more he pulled to get the boot off the more the knife cut into the foot. Finally the boot was removed and he was found to be very seriously injured.—Catasauqua (Pa.) News Item.

—Two days ago three Loys, aged respectively eighteen, sixteen and twelve, slipped into the house of Mr. Sterling Jenkins, who lives on the Talleyrand road, and stole a watch and some other valuables. Mr. Jenkins tracked and overtook them in Hamilton. He recovered his property, but did not desire to put the rascals in Jail, so he told them that if they would whip each other he would not prosecute them. This they agreed to do. They were taken out, stripped to the waist, and provided with stout hickory switches. The war was then on, and the others laid on his back lustily with the switches until Mr. Jenkins expressed himself satisfied. The ceremony was gone through with each one. They were then dispersed with smarting backs and penitent hearts. They said that their mother worked in the mills here, and that their father was dead.—Talbotton (Ga.) Times.

—We learn that near the plantation of Mr. Turner a most singular scene occurred—the charming of a thirteen-foot alligator by a rattlesnake. It appears that this snakeship first saw the gator, which was lying in the sun with his rattles, he attracted the latter's attention. Then began the charming process, which lasted fully half an hour. The gator at first turned his head twice or thrice, but was immediately called to order by the rattles of the snake. Toward the end of the half hour, with fixed eyes, the alligator moved slowly toward his terrible enemy, and with a sudden striking of jaws, when the snake curled himself more compactly, and with all the strength he could muster struck the alligator. For a moment the alligator shook tremendously, and then as if by magic made a precipitate backward movement peculiar to their 'gatorships and 'rought his tail down upon the would-be assassin with a force that killed him instantly. A Railroad Round the World.

"There is a great railroad, which, if it can be built, will eclipse all other enterprises in that line, and will be the greatest railroad in the world, connecting the Old and New World, and thus wedding all the dangers of the Atlantic Ocean. My road will connect the American Union with Asia and Europe. Just think of it. A railroad from Washington City to St. Petersburg, but only forty miles of water between these great cities of the New and Old World.

"My plan is for the United States, Great Britain and Russia, or the capitalists of these great countries, to construct this road. Let the road be built to some point on the line between Washington Territory and the British Possessions; say, where the Columbia River runs into Washington Territory. Then let England or English capitalists, build the road through New Georgia to the point where the Yoncan River runs into Alaska, and then through Alaska to Cape Prince of Wales on Behring Strait; then let Russia, or the company, composed of the capitalists of the Old and New World, construct the road from East Cape, or Behring Strait, to St. Petersburg. Passengers and freight can be carried from Cape Prince of Wales, America, to East Cape, Asia, directly opposite and only forty miles apart, by splendid steamers, built and put there for that purpose, and owned by this great company. Would not this be grand? Just imagine a trip from America to Asia and Europe, seated in splendid cars, with land under you and visible all the way, except forty miles (about as far as from Dover to Calais.

"If this great road could be built the danger of the stormy Atlantic would be avoided, and hundreds and thousands of noble men, women and children would be almost annually saved, as well as millions of treasure."

VEGETINE.

Into its composition, the medicinal virtues of a dozen or more chemically selected herbs, roots and barks enter, but in such a manner that no one of them predominates, the whole of each particular ingredient entering into their combination, a result always uniform, palatable and pleasant to the most delicate and refined taste. It should be said also that VEGETINE contains no mineral of any sort, and no opium, morphine, nor anything else of a harmful character whatever. Whatever powers for good it possesses, it owes to the presence of the curative principles which the Almighty has seen fit to scatter in such wonderful profusion throughout the vegetable kingdom for the benefit of man, and which, when taken in such doses as are required, will cure as much as a human disease in the whole compound. Nevertheless it possesses the speedy and penetrating action of the most virulent poison, never causing injury, but always and certainly the good. WHAT IT WORKS IN all diseases, and WHY it does it, are questions that it is a waste of time to ask. That it is a great remedy for the cure of all diseases originating from impure blood, is a fact that has been proved beyond the possibility of a doubt by the same class of evidence that is required to establish any other fact in the history of mankind. Its ingredients are known to all druggists, and its formula is open to the inspection of all physicians. Its power to cure is not based upon any secret combination of drugs, but upon the fact that it is the most perfect blood purifier ever discovered, and when the blood is pure health must follow, if the laws of life are not hopelessly broken down. Its great success is due to the fact that it does cure the various diseases originating from impure blood, when all other known remedies fail to do so. It is the only reliable blood purifier which can be prepared so that it can be taken with safety by the most delicate invalid, or the most robust man or woman, with the certainty that it will produce the desired effect. It is the only remedy which gives entire satisfaction when used in all cases of Scrofula, Scrofulous Humors, Glandular Swellings, Cancer, Cancerous Humors, Erysipelas, Salt Rheum, Boils, Carbuncles, Ringworm, Pimples, Blotches, Tetter, Scald Head, Sore Eyes, Rheumatism, Dropsy, Dyspepsia, Sick Headache, Female Complaints, Dizziness, Nervousness, Neuralgia, Kidney Complaints, Urinary Diseases, Diabetes, Fever Sores, Scarlet Fever, Sore Throat, Mercurial Diseases, Diseases caused by the use of Mercury, Bone Pains, Tumors, Ulcers, Blood Poisoning, Consumption (when in the early stages), Bronchitis, Catarrh, Liver Complaint, Piles, Constipation, Loss of Appetite, General Debility, and all diseases that require the use of a reliable Blood Purifier, Nervous Stimulant and Tonic.

HOME, FARM AND GARDEN.

—Whatever you cultivate, do it well. Whatever stock you have, get the best. Whatever fruit you have, let it be the choicest. Be at the head of your class. —Iowa State Register.

—Oil cloths can be easily and quickly spoiled by cleaning them with hot water and not wiping them properly. They should be washed with lukewarm water and wiped perfectly dry with a soft flannel.

—A farmer, after careful experiment, has concluded that to card sheep is to make them lose flesh. Two yoke fed exactly alike, the one carded and the other not, showed a gain for the yoke not carded. The same result occurred when the carding was changed to the other steers.—Evening Journal.

—In baking ginger snaps, take two tablespoonfuls boiling water, three of hot shortening, one heaping of ginger, one teaspoon saleratus; put all in a cupand fill with molasses; repeat this as often as desired to make a sufficient quantity; when all mixed, put in extra spoonful of shortening and one-half cup brown sugar; mix rather stiffly with flour; bake quickly.

If the virtue of oatmeal and water was properly understood it would be more generally drank in summer in place of spirits or beer, or even simple lee-water. In the navy, in hot weather, especially in the engineer department, it is regularly served out to the men. On land, especially to those exposed to excessive heat, it is very grateful; say a pailful of oatmeal to a pail of water.—Cor. N. Y. Sun.

—For the last five years I have not lost a cucumber or melon-vine or cabbage-plant. Get a barrel with a few gallons of gastar in its pour water on the tar; always have it ready when needed, and when the bugs appear give them a liberal drink of the tar-water from a sprinkler, or otherwise, and if the rain washes it off and they return repeat the dose. It will also destroy the Colorado potato-beetle and frighten the old long potato-bug worse than a threshing with a brush. Five years ago my husband made the same application, and I watched with the tar-water. The next day all Colorados that had not been well protected from the sprinkling, were dead, and the others, though their name was legion, were all gone, and I have never seen one of them on the farm since. I am aware that many will look upon this with indifference, because it is so cheap and simple a remedy. Such should always suffer both by their own and their neighbors' bugs, as they frequently do.—Chicago Tribune.

Keeping Ahead of Work.

A witty lecturer says that "some people have three hands." They have one in reserve, to use when their working beside which they have always a little behind-hand. He might well add that this sort of people are awfully disqualified to be farmers, and, if they are such, the three-handed farmers can never become free-handed. But, seriously, we have known more than one farmer to get ahead of the work from the opening of spring till the last job is finished in the fall. It is the only way to farm with either pleasure or profit. The farmer who gets behind at any season works at a serious disadvantage ever after; and it is no easy matter to manage just right to keep abreast of the work. The direction of a large farm demands executive abilities as great as does the man-gement of an army. The farmer has in fact an army—but his men are generally in the work of production rather than of destruction. To keep two to ten men employed profitably in all kinds of weather, requires thought and tact. The difficulty with most farmers is that they do not hire enough help. They underestimate the amount of work required, and make no just allowance for rainy days when little or nothing can be done out of doors.

Up to harvest time most farmers do pretty well. But unless work is pretty well advanced before haying and harvesting begin, it is pretty sure to be all in a tangle by the time the grain is in the barn. There are two, three or four weeks when little is usually done except securing the hay and grain crops. Then is the time when weeds run riot in potatoes, corn, beans and other hoed crops. We have often known fields to become so weedy in harvest time that the crops cost more to get out of the weeds than they were worth. Plenty of help at such times is all-important. Keep the cultivator going in the hoed crops though you have to pay harvest wages to do it. One day's work at the right time is worth five a week or two later. In the harvest field half extra help is almost equally important. The press season is proving very showery and "catching" in many sections. When we have a really good day for curing hay or grain, there should be plenty of help to take advantage of it. We know farmers who at such times fit out an extra wagon and with extra teams will keep the barn constantly filling. One or two men, if needed, are stationed in the barn to move away, and an equal number in the field to load. This rapid pushing of work is far the cheapest. Often after one or two days of fine weather so have rains which delay work in the hay or harvest field for twice that length of time. Meanwhile hay or grain is spoiling, and at last it costs more to get it housed in bad condition than it would at first to have it saved in good.

Of course, the good farmer will have all the labor-saving implements. This is the great advantage of using mowers and reapers. They will do the work with less men. The farmers, however, should not hire less; but employ the time and labor saved in getting the work promptly and therefore more cheaply done. Whoever uses mowers and reapers merely to save hired help gets very little advantage from them. In all probability he will lose as much on other crops, and possibly more than he will save in hired help. We know that prices of farm products are low; but labor is also nearly or quite as cheap as before the war, and considering the improvements in farm machinery, farmers can get more done for ten dollars now than they ever could before. The temptation to many farmers is to save in their help-expense account. But if the farm is worth working at all it is surely worth working well, and the larger the amount judiciously expended for farm labor, the larger will be the profits and the greater the independence derived from itself. Doing with too little help fills the soil with weeds, and where these obtain control, all hope of profit is at an end. —Rural New Yorker.

Stacking.

In traveling over the country and observing the stacking, one is convinced that there is a luck in the practice. We do not know whether it arises from want of knowledge in regard to this important part of farm work, or indifference, but we are certain that it causes a heavy leak in the finances of many farmers, to say nothing of domestic trouble arising therefrom. Then the result of improper practice in taking care of the harvest. The first requisite is good drafting, which cannot be accomplished without good binding. All sheaves should be tight and straight. Too many binders have a habit of leaving all their sheaves in a twist and too loosely bound, which makes it impossible to put up a snug shock and one that will stand. Spoiled shocks is a prelude to spoiled stacks. It is just as easy to turn the knot on the bands inboard when shocking, as outward; and that is the point where injury is pretty sure to creep in. Don't say this is too much trouble, or that you can't remember. If you follow the practice persistently one season, it will become such a habit that you will do it without thought.

In stacking, the first important thing is to have the bottom level, and a proper distance from the ground. It is dangerous to depend upon leveling with grain, as the stack will be sure to settle to that side. Another fruitful cause of over-setting is the want of a due lack of energy or muscle in pitching, causing the sheaves to land on the side instead of the center of the stack. Some endeavor to remedy this by leaning the stack slightly to the side on which the pitching is done, on the supposition that because this side is packed down the closest the other will settle the most, but we have seen the weight of grain shelled from the heavy ears carry the stack badly to that side. The only safe plan is to have the sheaves pitched in the center, as nearly as possible.

In starting a stack, begin in the center and build around, turning the butts out and tops upward, until the outside rail is reached; then reverse the order, building on the outside row first, placing the butts of the next row snug up to the bands of the last, and so continue layer after layer, lapping sufficient to keep the stack nearly level—a little higher in the middle will make no difference. Build the first three courses perpendicular on the outside, the second time around batter a little in each round until you have bulged it three feet all around. This should be accomplished by the time your stack gets rounded up to its intended height. This will locate the bulk of the weight low, thus materially lessening the danger of swaying or settling to one side. So far you may safely depend upon the bulge saving all below, but now the center of the stack must be immediately filled up, then two courses put on, keeping the outside perpendicular and increasing the fullness of the center each round. Commence to draw in gradually at first. This will come more natural if the center is gradually raised each succeeding course, and the sheaves are made to make the blunder that is fatal to the stack—putting the second row of the course too far out on the outside row. The distance from the butt of the second row to the butt of the outside row should be as much greater than the distance between the same points of the other rows of the course, as the "straw" you intend to make at the next course. Thus, the distance between the butts of the two outside rows should be continually increasing, while that of the other inside rows should be decreasing. The effect of this is to make the outside row lie solid and the butts catch on the succeeding row.

But to put it, after all your pains, the stack should swing? There are two remedies: the blocking under one side may be knocked out or dug under so as to sink it, or a row of grain can be pulled out immediately below the bulge, tramping or pounding down the butts of the rows above. We have had stacks badly leaned, that were brought back to a perpendicular by one or the other of these methods. A little determination will often overcome the most serious difficulty.—*Cor. Hunting Wild Turkeys.

The number of wild turkeys that we saw at one of our encampments on the banks of a creek, very appropriately called Turkey Creek, was incredible. So plentiful were they, and so appreciated was their flesh by the whole party, that no less than 150 birds were shot in the space of ten days. More could undoubtedly have been obtained had they been wanted. They were magnificent birds, and would frequently weigh from twenty-five to thirty pounds each. So epicurean did we get in our tastes that we seldom condescended to eat any part but the breast of the turkey. As a rule, the time to shoot them is just after dark, when the poor unsuspecting birds are roosting in the branches of the trees; but shooting them thus by moonlight or dusk is, in my opinion, very poor sport—if, indeed, it can be called sport at all. There is also a difficulty in hitting them when the light is dim and obscure. I know one officer who fired fifteen times before he bagged a bird, yet in the daytime he was accounted a very fair shot. And I have also known the same gentleman to shoot at the same bird eight times without even frightening it away; at the eighth shot the bird considered it getting monotonous, with the fun all on one side, so flew away. In the daytime, hunting these birds is by no means bad sport, for the wild turkey is usually very shy, and will lie closely concealed in the long prairie grass until nearly kicked up, when they fly off with such a whirring and flapping of wings as would be sufficient to startle any young and inexperienced sportsman. On one occasion I succeeded in bagging no less than five turkeys with one discharge of my gun, without even taking the trouble of dismounting from my horse; alarmed at my approach, the birds raised their heads above the grass, craning their long necks round to discover the intruder, and so close together were they that they all fell victims to their curiosity. When found on the open prairie at some distance from their roosts they can be run down on horseback, for after the first two, or at the most three flights, none of which are beyond 100 yards, they get so exhausted as to be unable to fly any more, and are then easily overtaken and killed. They invariably go about in flocks or droves, numbering from ten to as many as forty and fifty birds.—Good Words.

The growth of the nails is more rapid in children than in adults and slowest in the aged; it goes on faster in summer than in winter, so that the same nail which is renewed in 132 days in winter requires only 74 in summer. The increase of the nails of the right hand is more rapid than those of the left; however it differs for the different fingers, and in order corresponds with the length of the finger, consequently it is the fastest in the middle finger, nearly equal in these on either side of this, slower in the little finger and slowest in the thumb. The growth of all the nails on the left hand requires eighty-two days more than those of the right.—N. Y. Graphic.

—One of the most serviceable trailers is the plant commonly called German ivy. It is of most rapid growth with light-green leaves, studded with pellucid dots and never troubled by insects. As a screen for a window, or covering for a walk, it is most valuable. It is easily propagated, every joint rooting if placed in the earth. The flowers are straw-colored, and often produced in greatest profusion. The plant is a native of the Cape of Good Hope, and has been introduced many years. It is admirably adapted for baskets.—Boston Traveller.

You will save time, much sickness and great expense if you will use one bottle of Hop Bitters in your family this month. It's cheap. See other column.

Household Economy.

The housekeeper or cook who studies economy in the kitchen, can show us in one direction by always using Dooley's Yeast Powder. It will be found a truly economical and valuable assistant in baking biscuits, rolls, bread, pies of all kinds, waffles, muffins, and most all articles prepared from flour; and why? Because, in using the Dooley Powder you save its cost in shortening, in patience, in everything; and when the baking is done, it is turned out light, palatable and wholesome, so that every morsel is eaten up and no waste.

Republican County Convention

A Republican County Convention to nominate candidates for County officers, will be held at the Town Hall in the village of Charlevoix, on Thursday the 5th day of September, 1878, at one o'clock in the afternoon. Each Township will be entitled to one delegate for every twenty registered voters, and every fraction of twenty over ten. Each delegation will bring, in addition to their credentials a certified copy of the number of voters in their respective Townships. The County Committee, at their last meeting, passed the following resolution:

Resolved: That we recommend to the several Township Committees that that they give at least six days notice of their nominees by posting written notices in at least three of the most conspicuous places in the Township.

That there may be a full and fair representation of the Republican voters, it is hoped that the recommendation will be strictly observed.

ROBERT MILLER,
Chairman Rep. Co. Com.
Charlevoix, Aug. 12, 1878.

TWO GOOD OFFICERS.—If experience is worth anything anywhere, it is in public stations. We hope Charlevoix county will continue in office for another term the present Treasurer, Byron See. He has served the people faithfully and well, and his experience has given him an intimate knowledge of the difficult duties of his office.

Two years ago A. R. Upright was elected Clerk and Register, and the opposition of the SENTINEL to his election is on record. To day we record a desire to see him re-elected to the position. He has proven himself attentive, faithful, and fully competent. Charlevoix county owes to Mr. Upright a recognition of his faithful stewardship.

WE personally asserted some time since that the "dark lantern" process was being used largely in the primary caucus for Representative and county officers. We now assert it editorially. In Evelyne the Township caucus was secretly held by a narrow circle of zealous politicians, and the people had no voice in the selection of their delegate. It was [v]oted by this secret conclave that the same delegate should act at the county convention for the nomination of county officers. If we are incorrect let the chairman of the Township Committee rise and explain.

Republicans throughout the State will be glad to learn of the renomination of Hon. O. D. Conger for Congress in the Port Huron district. Mr. Conger has the position of a recognized leader in the House, and his influence is not only of vast importance to his State but to the Nation. This comes from two things, the sterling integrity and staunch Republicanism of the man, and the good sense of the Republicans of his district, who, having found a good Representative, keep him in service, thus securing a trained legislator. The 9th District can well emulate the example of the Republicans of Mr. Conger's District, by again placing Hr. Hubbell in nomination, who ranks with Mr. Conger among the leaders of the House of Representatives.

FIVE millions more of the five twenty bonds are called in by the Secretary of the Treasury. Thus the burden of interest is reduced $100,000 per annum more. These things are what make the "Nationals" as "mad as Merch hares."

CARELESS SURVEYS.—A correspondent writes that the people of the Northern counties of the State are suffering seriously from careless surveys. The original lines are so inaccurately drawn that a resurvey was necessary, and the errors of the Government surveyors have been multiplied by their local successors. The uncertainty become so great that the Hon. Geo. E. Steele, Surveyor of Antrim county, wrote to the Secretary of State for the standard yard measure which the statute says shall be kept in the State archives, and he received an answer that there was a stick there said to be a yard in length, but nobody appeared to know certainly whether it was or not. Mr. Steele then applied to the Government at Washington, and at considerable expense got the Government standard of linest measure, a steel rod attested to be exactly six feet long. With this he has tested a number of surveyor's chains, not one of which was found to be correct, the links lengthening by wear. One chain which had been in long and constant use was found to be four and one-eighth inches too long in thirty three feet. In surveying a quarter section by metes and bounds with this chain the error would amount to three and sixty two one hundredths acres, or in surveying a road ten miles long the error would amount to eighteen rods. When the survey is made not by metes and bounds but by bisecting a line already surveyed, of course the error would not appear. Another chain was found to be two and three twenty-sixths inches too long, and a third about two inches. The confusion which must result from the use of chains is almost incalculable.—Grand Rapids Eagle.

It is reported that Jeff Davis is anxious to be elected to the United States Senate. The memory of some of us runneth back to the time when Jeff voluntarily left the seat he lawfully held in the Senate and walked out to engage in a business that involved the violation of his sacred oath.

Under the Homestead law, any adult person may enter 160 acres of $1.25 land or 80 acres of $2.50 land, without cost, except a light fee, on the condition of cultivating and occupying the same five years. It is a Republican law.

AN EXAMPLE.—Here is an instance of what industry and pluck will do. Ten years ago, David Hogan, of South Arm, landed at Charlevoix with his family, worse off than nothing, having been compelled to borrow $28.66 to pay freight on his household effects. To day he has a farm of 160 acres of land, 94 acres of which are under improvement. This fall he has 500 bushels of wheat 700 bushels of oats, 2000 bushels of turnips, and an abundance of other crops, and the best of all he is out of debt. This country wants a few more David Hogans.

BEAR.—Some one saw a bear in the suburbs of the village, one day last week and immediately every able bodied man was out with a weapon of some kind. The bear made good his escape, but Walter Mannay narrowly escaped injury by the flying out of the breech of his gun, which he fired off at the close of the chase.

General News Summary.

DOMESTIC.

A BOLD and daring train robbery was perpetrated about half past one o'clock, on the morning of the 13th, at a point one mile below Whitbrop Junction, opposite Atchison, Kan. Four men boarded the passenger train bound south, at Whitbrop Junction, getting on the platform between the baggage-car and the first coach. When the conductor started to go through the train from the baggage-car, the leader of the four men pointed two revolvers toward him and ordered him back into the baggage-car. The robbers then entered the car and ordered the baggage-man and a young man with him to hold up their hands, which they did. Wells Fargo express agent, was sitting in a chair in the lightest end of the car, his bills in his lap and the express safe open beside him, busy with his work, when a revolver was suddenly thrust in his face, and he was ordered to hold up his hands. The leader of the gang then deliberately transferred the money in the safe, about $5,000, to a sack they had with them. With their pistols in his face they then ordered the conductor to stop the train, and pulled the bell-rope. As the train slowed up the robbers backed out of the car, still covering the inmates with their pistols, and disappeared in the darkness. The entire work was done in five minutes, and none of the many passengers on the train knew of the robbery until the perpetrators had escaped.

The Pacific Railroad, through counsel, requested to be allowed a hearing against the decision, before the regulations were promulgated, and the Secretary gave them until the 20th to file their arguments. This action on the part of the company was considered to be an indication that they intended to fight the Secretary's decision at every stage of the proceedings which might be taken under it.

The Alcalde of Newtown was induced to accompany Col. Young to this side of the river, when he stated that Arcola stole cattle from Texas for a living, and took them to Mexico and sold them—the regular Mexican troops being the purchasers, the Mexican officials knowing them for stolen. The Alcalde also gave information implicating high Mexican officials in the robberies. Owing to high water, part of McKenzie's forces failed to cross, and the trail of the stock being obliterated, Col. Young's command was forced to return.

LEET, a recent witness before the Potter Committee, took a room at the Astor House, in New York, on the evening of the 18th, and shortly after fired a bullet from a pistol through the door of his room, and raised a great hue and cry. On officers bursting open the door of the room, Leet fired at them twice, but they finally overpowered him. He was terribly excited, and said there was a conspiracy to kill him on account of his testimony before the committee, that he carried a private memorandum book with him contaning some additional startling testimony, and it was this book they were after. Leet was taken to a Police Station and locked up. He swore at everyone, and denounced all as part of a band of conspirators. He was taken before a Magistrate, on the morning of the 19th, charged with disorderly conduct, and exhibited the same symptoms of insanity that had characterized his conduct the night before. He was finally committed to the charge of the Commissioners of Charity and Correction, with a view to an examination of his mental condition.

MICHIGAN STATE NEWS.

Fuller; Superintendent of Public Instruction, Samuel Dickey; Land Commissioner, William G. Brown; Auditor-General, L. L. Farnsworth; Member of State Board of Education, Chas. Latour. 7. The abolition of all barbarous modes and instruments of punishment, as contrary to the law of the love of God and the claims of humanity, the discipline of Jails and Prisons, and of their inmates, and of whatever else is unworthy of our age and Nation which regards the system of correction as a means for the prevention of crime.

The Modern Little Girl.

SHE begins life by taking airings in a new-fashioned baby-carriage, wrapped up in an afghan, and propelled on her way by a smart nurse-maid, who takes this opportunity of flirting with questionable admirers, and making appointments for future flirtations.

As the little girl progresses, she copies mamma, and the other ladies of her set. She will want to wear a "pull-back" by the time she is four years old, and kid gloves at six, certainly.

Her soft hair will be tortured with "curlers" and crimping pins by the time it is grown long enough to wind around anything, and if it escapes the vile processes of the curling iron, we may consider it a lucky circumstance.

The modern little girl wants to be a young lady as soon as possible. She sighs for the time when she can have a reception, and wear a train, and carry a fan, and have hot-house bouquets sent to her by admiring admirers.

She reads novels by gas-light, and hides them under her pillow when older or less precocious people come in her sitting. She has her ideal hero six feet tall, with hair and eyes like the raven's wing, and a melancholy face, caused by "carking care," and the "dust of a good bed to sleep in, for your hero of description is found growing around old ruins and beside marshy lakes, gazing at the moon and bewailing his lonely condition.

The modern little girl wears corsets by the time she is ten years old, and is particular about the fit of her boots and the length of her pocket handkerchief.

She could not think of helping her mother wash the dishes, or put the rooms to rights, because housework spoils the hands, and sweeping will dislodge dust in the hair.

When she is called upon for any useful service, she is so tired, and she must get all those French exercises written before to-morrow morning. But when some young friends come for her to go and play croquet, she wakes into new life, and goes with them, and plays till twelve o'clock at night easily enough, and does not get at all tired—no, no indeed! Playing croquet is such delightful exercise.

She knows all the gossip of the town as well as any of her elders, and she can talk over the broken matches, and the divorce suits, and the various other scandals with the best of them.

She has a great deal to say about beaux, and speaks of setting her cap for this one, and that one, and designates all single women over twenty as "British old maids," and wonders what they are always poking themselves into society for?

By way of accomplishments she plays on the piano-forte, buckles easier at the house where she resides, and will have bigger hair and more elaborate bonnets than anybody else.

She likes to stay at parties of that kind until other folks go home, and not be hurried away by "ma" before eleven o'clock, just like a little girl! and she will lie in bed half the next day, and in two days be ready for just such another event.

By the time she is twenty she is passe and faded, and if she marries, she is totally unfit for the duties of wife and mother; but she is fashionable, and quite up to the times, and what cause have we old fogies to say anything about her?—Kate Thorn, in N. Y. Weekly.

THERE is something solemn in the tones of a great bell striking midnight, especially if you are a mile from home, and know that your wife is sitting behind the hall-door waiting for you.

MOSS ROSES.

Pink with the faintest rosy glow,
They bloom on their mossy stems;
They gleam the borders with their bloom,
And wreathe with theirrich perfume
The mossy garden-gems.

The dew that from their brimming leaves
Drips down the mignonette-like reeves,
And sweeter grows thereby;
The fall of rare lilies cloud-snow,
In raiment white and gold, and here
The purple pansies lie.

Warm sunshine glitters over all,
On tinsel-scarf and ivied wall,
On lily tower, rose-bower;
While flitting round each garden-bed,
With joyous laugh and airy tread,

A little human blossom, bright
With richness, innocent delight
Of life yet in its dawn;
With sunshine crimsoned in her hair,
Deep eyes unshadowed by a care,
And heart as free as fawn.

She plucks the light, elastic tread,
And stays to hear the cooing
Of doves in their leafy dwelling;
Eyes slanted for the tiny lizard
We play God Save the Queen across the Hands,
Our little daughter for—

Yes, bless the Rose, dear God, since we Have given our Lily back to thee
That thou should'st have her more;
Yet bless her deeply, doubly now
In Thine awful smile.

How often in her merry laugh
Our hungry, longing ears can trace
Her mother's voice, long ago;
How often in her merry face
A music sake, more sad than mine,
Of accents loaded for me!

God bless the child to blossom her e,
Our clinging human hearts to close t,
Till life has reached the close;
To grow a crowned queen and throne,
To beautify the floor of Heaven,
Our precious daughter Rose!

A LITTLE BROWN DOG.

He was a poor little fellow, errand-boy in the large grocery of Rice, Clover & Co. (I don't mean the brown dog, but Harry Jacklow). And he earned just two dollars a week.

Sixty cents of this went for car fare —he lived so far from the store that he was obliged to ride to and from it—and the other forty was his mother, who, with that and the eighty cents a week she received from the cloak factory where she worked, supported herself, her children and a large variety of ugly, designless all single women over twenty as "British old maids," and wonders what they are always poking themselves into society for?

By way of accomplishments she plays on the piano-forte, buckles easier at the house where she resides, and will have bigger hair and more elaborate bonnets than anybody else.

She likes to stay at parties of that kind until other folks go home, and not be hurried away by "ma" before eleven o'clock, just like a little girl! and she will lie in bed half the next day, and in two days be ready for just such another event.

Wouldn't it be fun to look at their faces when they saw the lobscrouse, and the sponge-cake, and the molasses candy, and the lemonade, and the apple pie, and the cheese, and the baked potatoes! It would be almost as good as the circus. Harry had been there once, and had never forgotten how delightful it was. And then, after supper was over, and they thought the entertainment at an end, wouldn't it be fun again to see their faces when he invited them down on the front stoop to see the pyrotechnic (look in your dictionary) display!

So Harry had been saving, and saving, and saving, until he found himself, on the evening of the 3d of July, with one dollar and eighty-two cents in his right hand trousers pocket. Times had been hard, very hard, since the new year began, and people had looked very sharply after their small change, for it is likely he would have had double that amount. "But," he said to himself, "A dollar will get the food, and the rest will buy at least a dozen nice fire-crackers."

He got home from the store on that evening too late and too tired to go out for the things he wanted, but the next morning, just as Harry had done, only without the whistle. "Tell me all about it."

And he looked so kind and good that Harry did tell him all about it. And when the story was finished, the gentleman said to the man at the door, "Your boy may take the money, Lewis. But wait—we'll see if Prince is really here."

And lo! by their new friend, the children went in. There were dogs of all kinds there, all sizes, all colors, all ages—but dogs could be yelping, barking, growling and moaning.

Nellie looked eagerly around, and shouted "Prince!" as loud as she could shout, but could scarcely hear herself, so great was the noise. Ben, a little brown dog, whose ears must have been much sharper than hers, sprang forward with a cry of delight that seemed to come out of the very top of his little brown head.

"It's Prince! it's Prince!" cried Nellie, clapping her hands in delight; and the next moment he was in her arms, covering her face with dog kisses.

Harry smiled out, handing the doorman the money as he passed. The tall gentleman followed with the little girl and her dog; and when they were all in the street once more, he stooped and patted Prince on the head, at the same time tucking Harry's handkerchief, which was hanging half-way out, into his jacket pocket, and saying, "You'll lose that if you're not careful, my boy."

Then he kissed both children, and went into the pound again. And Nellie threw her arms around Harry's neck and gave him a good hug and told him she should love him forever, and made him promise to come and see her and Prince, and they parted.

"And that's the end of our Fourth-of-July party," said Harry, a short time after, to the Jacklow family, as he finished his breakfast and his story at the same time.

"You're a good boy, and did just right," said all the Jacklow family, with the exception of Mr. Jacklow, who remarked mildly that "that dollar and ninety-two cents would have kept him in tobacco a long while."

And baby Jennie came and gave her big brother a sweet kiss—in fact, a very sweet kiss, for some of the syrup which she had been eating on her bread and butter went with it! and as she toddled away, Harry pulled out his handkerchief to wipe his mouth. It came out with a jerk, and four bright new silver half-dollars came with it, and falling on the floor with a pleasant sound, rolled away toward the corners as fast as they could. But they were pounced upon before they had rolled a foot.

"The tall gentleman!" said Harry.

"God bless him!" said his mother.

"I wish I had the morning paper," said Mr. Jacklow.

And there was a party after all, and beside the family there were three other guests—an old woman, a small girl, and a little brown dog.—Harper's Weekly.

Hot Weather in India.

The hot weather throughout India this year has been described on all sides as of exceptional severity. In Calcutta the heat has been extraordinary even for that part of the country, and there have been numerous cases of heat apoplexy reported. In the northwest Provinces the heat has been almost unprecedented. We hear of the thermometer registering as much as 120 deg. in the shade, and of deaths taking place even among the natives in consequence. Regarding the south of India, we find that the heat has been no less remarkable there than it has been in other parts of the country. The colony has one of the Madras newspapers reported that the air was so hot that a chercoot could almost be lighted at it. Monday we have had our share of hot weather. The monsoon days, as at least broken, but before it did the new of the situation were wonderful. There are few days of heat in India, and each has its admirers. There is the moist heat of the seaboard, during the rains, and the dry heat of up-country. Sojourners in the latter say, when they come down to Bombay, that the damp moisture in the air is more sickening than the hot winds of the Deccan. With khus khus tatties to help reduce the temperature indoors up-country, but the moistened atmosphere of Bombay will admit of no such palliation. It hangs over you everywhere like a steaming blanket. Go where you will, do what you will, there is no escape from it and its immediate attendants, inordinate perspiration, collapsed energies, liver complaints and prickly heat.

The monsoon, which generally breaks about the 8th of June, held off with a persistency which was phenomenal, and the best day after day was tremendous. There were at least two nights when sleep was next to impossible. Pie air was perfectly still. Not a leaf fluttered. The faintest zephyr wafted from the sea would have been a godsend, but it came not. The awful hot stillness served the prelude to some supernatural calamity. We surveyed a mysterious sense of waiting for something worse to come. A grand, crashing, destructive

OUR PARIS LETTER.

To the Editor of the Sentinel:

A period of 3 months is in progress over the future of the Eads Ist River bridge, which has already swallowed up (including interest, over $12,000,000, and which is probably not more than half completed. Being out of money to go ahead with, the Bridge Commissioners have made the usual requisition upon the Comptroller for a fresh issue of bonds as provided by law for the raising of New York's third of the expense. The Comptroller has flatly refused to comply, on the ground that there has been gross extravagance, mismanagement and fraud in the conduct of the work thus far, that the legal limit of expenditure will be passed long before the structure is finished, that the bridge when built will be a nuisance to shipping, and in any case of no advantage except to Brooklyn. The Corporation Counsel of New York city, being applied to for an opinion wrote an elaborate one to the effect that Comptroller Kelly had no option in the matter, but was bound to issue the bonds. Still the Comptroller holds out and refuses to "look over" until a judicial decision shall have been obtained. The newspapers have taken it up, the majority supporting the Comptroller in his action, and thus the matter stands. The force of workmen have been dismissed, and everything is at a deadlock.

There is doubtless a colored gentleman somewhere in this woodpile as witness the growth of the estimates. A prominent merchant who knows the whole story recently expressed himself as follows: "The bridge," he said, "is a more gigantic swindle than the Court House or the Capitol at Albany. It began in the same way, with a decent first small appropriation, and year after year the grasping ring have voted for more, more. In 1860 J. A. Roebling estimated the cost at $2,000,000, in 1866 he increased his estimate to $4,000,000, in 1867 to $7,000,000; all this for a height of 200 feet. In 1872 his son, Colonel W. A. Roebling, made the estimate $9,500,000, although the proposed height of the bridge had been reduced from 200 to 136 feet. In 1873 the estimate was $13,145,000, and I believe it will go on increasing until it reaches $25,000,000. There seems to be no limit to the grasping capacity of the Bridge Ring, and unless the financial officers of New York shut down on them they will continue to demand money, until they have saddled the city with an enormous debt in addition to her already too great responsibilities."

More than this it is said to be a serious question whether the bridge with its enormous weight would be safe after it was done. So we are in a rather unenviable quandary. If the bridge goes on to completion we have got to stand a drain of money for years with the possibility of having after all only an unsafe practically useless structure to show for it. If the work is abandoned the two cities of New York and Brooklyn not only are out of pocket many millions of dollars but have exposed themselves to the ridicule of the world for having reared two such costly monuments of reckless jobbery as the piers of the Brooklyn Bridge would then have proved to be.

As the dispatches come barreling in from the plague-stricken South, each bearing more dismal tidings than its predecessor, some uneasiness has been felt for the safety of New York, from which town it is, of course, impossible to entirely exclude fugitives from the yellow fever districts. One or two alleged cases of the disease have indeed been discovered here, but no great vigilance is exercised at quarantine and throughout the Health Department that I presume we really have little foundation for our fears. The appeals for help, which New York is always the first city to receive in cases of local distress anywhere in the country, have begun to pour in, and as usual, are promptly responded to. Several thousands of dollars have already been contributed and forwarded, and more is being done in the same direction. The violence and rapid spread of the scourge has had a serious effect on our Southern trade for this season amounting in some lines to its almost complete ruin.

Among the measures introduced to check the spread of the disease is the new one of disinfecting the mails before forwarding from the yellow fever towns.

The most salient feature, thus far, of the session of the Butler-Potter investigating Committee in New York, has been the extraordinary testimony of the New Orleans witness, Lott. During the days of his examination much interest was displayed in the proceedings owing to the curious strange manner and startling statements. It now seems that Lott was at least partially insane while he was giving this testimony. After being released from attendance on the committee he went to the Astor House where after displaying his mental aberration by confining to the hotel people in fear that he was constantly pursued by kidnappers and assassins, he locked himself in his room and fired several shots through the door at the clerk and a policeman who endeavored to gain entrance. He was quickly secured, however, and is now in the Bloomingdale Insane Asylum.

Three funerals have taken place this week in which the scene of object and interest were filled by members of the dramatic profession. Old William Niblo, who as restaurateur and theatrical manager was dear to the last generation of New Yorkers, died at the age of almost ninety years, wealthy and highly respected by the few who knew him, so retired had been his life for many years past, that but a very small number of us suspected that the founder of Niblo's Garden, the palmiest days of which were before our advent into the world, still dwelt among us. Mr Niblo became a great amateur of pulling after his retirement from dramatic business and, I believe, leaves a fine collection behind him.

The second of the obsequies referred to were those of George Vining Brower, the comedian who will, perhaps, be longest remembered by his fine personation of Abe Truckard in Southern's Hod Andersen. The third, and last of all, was the funeral [illegible] Montague the [illegible], pastor and talented, the news of whose sudden death in San Francisco caused deep sorrow wherever he was known. The ceremonies took place in the "little church around the corner," and were conducted as has become the custom on such occasions, by Dr. Houghton who in the future will surely be awarded a niche among the patron saints of actors. Mr Montague had been a regular attendant at this church and a personal friend of its pastor, whose eulogy of the dead actor was warm and sincere. A throng and mourners were present at the services.

THE POTTER INVESTIGATING COMMITTEE

The Potter Investigating Committee resumed its sessions in New York, on the 15th, but in the absence of several members no witnesses were examined.

Gen. Butler asked that Stanley Matthews be summoned. Mr. Potter said he had been summoned a few days before, and had replied that previous engagements would prevent his attendance. Mr. Butler said that if Matthews's answer meant that he would not respond to a summons, the sergeant-at-arms was ready to serve the process of the House of Representatives and Senate the latter. He moved that it be ordered on the record that "Matthews refuses to appear before the Committee, and that the same be reported to the House for their action in the matter."

Chairman said he would entertain the motion, but thought it better to await the presence of absent members before taking a vote.

WM. H. ROBERTS, editor of the N. O. Times, was examined, on the 13th, and testified that he endorsed Nicholls and Tilden carried Louisiana. Witness spoke of the visit of Governor Hayes, in 1866 or 1868 to investigate the cause of the riots. He was a good deal with a good talker, and made friends for his party. Witness also knew Mr. Foster, of Ohio, and believed him a truthful man; inclined to talk as he felt. Mr. Foster said he was selected to go to Ohio and ascertain the views of Gov. Hayes, and what he would do in case of his election to the Presidency. He was silent giving the result of his conversation with Mr. Hayes, who gave him a sealed letter to Hayes, when Mr. Hayes's letter to the Committee, stating his views and answers leading to throw mud upon the President. He related the interview between Gov. Nicholls and Mr. Hayes, when the Chairman of the Committee objected to the witness detailing at length his interview with Halstead and his subsequent interviews with Hayes and Lamar. His policy appears to be to send for persons to ascertain what was the policy of the Senate, to which witness replied that he had some time ago. Witness was not certain that Hayes knew such policy, but he did not know. He did not know the contents of Hayes's letter. Mr. Beck did not see his interview with Gov. Hayes, which was according to the census of the colored people. The witness was asked whether the registration could be changed by any undisclosed fact that could satisfy a Republican.

J. C. Ambrose testified to having received a telegram from ex-Congressman Townsend, in which the following appears: "Don't keep anything back in case of a contest from Hayes's friends." His policy appears to be to send for persons to ascertain what was the policy of the Senate, to which the party who will make a democratic governor next fall. How could Democrats find out before such people as me, etc." Witness refer to me. I can be certified when necessary. I prefer it. Your letter taken with your saw in it." Witness thought telegram was in cipher. Was not able. Could discreetly, not do it upon them as agent. Hayes are in the same interest. Witness decided I ever sell a miserable paper that is pecuniarily embarrassed; but when I was in Pending the country a kindness to a cause.

JOHN A. LEET was recalled, on the 15th, and testified that Anderson, on his return from East Orleans, told him that he had carried out the programme arranged between Kellogg, Anderson and others, which was to keep colored Republicans from voting so that the returning board could throw out the entire vote, if necessary. Anderson told witness that he did not like to engage a second time for Kellogg and lose the last fig. He said witness both agreed that the Republicans in Louisiana were defeated, but were certain that, though defeated, they would win by violence anyhow. In an interview Kellogg, that official ballot that he would count in favor of anyone. Witness knew very well that Sherman and the visiting statesmen had come down to see that Nicholls and Packard first, even without Anderson's protest. Witness would have known, out the vote. Witness further said: "They would manufacture a lot of affidavits just for the moment's appearance of the thing." Kellogg wanted witness to make affidavits similar, but he refused. He had never done wrong in his life, and had an honored name to maintain. He would not be willing to go counter to the teachings of his conscience. He thought, in meeting Anderson he should get enough evidence out of him to expose the whole thing and make a sensation and his fortune. He couldn't say what he would have done if some one had offered him $250,000 to keep quiet and the legal moral statesmen had come pressing around him to keep his mouth shut. When Anderson told him he had signed the protest and got no money for it, he told him the viewing statesmen and Kellogg would have him in the mud. Witness told him if he held out with his protest, he could get documents from these visiting statesmen that would make them sit down for the remainder of their political lives. About this time Anderson began jumping around and threatening to whip Tilden, Kellogg and everyone else. Kellogg and others called on me one day and said: "Come, old fellow, I want to introduce you to some visiting statesmen." The statesmen assured the lad of the Naval Office, and then they got down to the affidavits. Witness told Kellogg he would not go to such a lot of old women. He was afraid that if he met them they might get something out of him. Anderson told witness that he and Weber had had an interview with Sherman, and that he had promised him everything. Witness then continued: "I told Anderson there was no unmitigated hustler to believe in anything of a settled character. He said he was promised the Naval Office, and I told him he would never get it, and he knew it. Another man he called on me and said: 'I've got $5.' I replied: 'Well, you've got three holes.' He replied: 'No, sir; I've got three aces.' He pulled out a letter, and sure enough it was from John Sherman and dated; was a letter giving him the Naval Office. He showed me a letter from John Sherman's natural feet of the letter, but refused to let me see the remainder of the letter. I had a talk with Weber and Anderson about that letter. Kellogg said the letter was all right. I considered the count of Sherman followed, between Gen. Sherman and Anderson, before Gen. Sherman left, and he said it

A TERRIBLE nitro-glycerine explosion occurred at Negaunee, Mich., on the 21st, resulting in the instant death of four men who were in the employ of the Miners' Powder Company, at whose works they were, at the time of the accident, engaged in the manufacture of glycerine. The bodies of two of the victims were mutilated past recognition, and the debris of the company's works were scattered over a large area.

A SPECIAL telegram from Washington, on the 21st, to the Chicago Tribune says the President had settled upon a policy as regards the Rio Grande border difficulties with Mexico, to the following effect: Raiders are to be pursued with increased vigor when they retreat to Mexican soil, and punished when caught, and the troops engaged in such pursuits will be instructed from time to time. While not seeking a conflict with the Mexican regular forces, the commanding officer of the pursuing parties will not avoid one if such forces interfere. While on Mexican soil the pursuing forces will strictly confine themselves to the single object of their expedition, and take the utmost care to give no offense or cause of complaint to the Mexican authorities. No offense is meant to the Mexican Government, the design of the United States being simply to punish depredations upon the rights, property and lives of its citizens, which have been made by the south side of the Rio Grande as a result of the execution of this policy will be accepted by the Administration as an immediate cause of war between the two countries, but if the Mexican regular troops shall cross the river in retaliation for these measures a cause will may be construed therefrom.

THERE were 11,472,500 of the new stand ard silver dollars coined up to the 16th of August. Of these 7,780,000 had been placed in circulation, leaving 10,079,487 on hand in the Government Treasury. The Secretary of War had made liberal provision for furnishing rations to the destitute in the South, and orders were given on that day for a supply of 5,000 rations for Grenada. Liberal contributions were being made for the yellow-fever sufferers.

THERE were two cases of yellow fever discovered in Philadelphia, on the night of the 24th. A man died at the New York Quarantine hospital, on the 26th, of yellow fever, contracted while unloading a cargo of logwood.

AT Memphis, on the 25th, the yellow-fever record showed a decrease in the number of new cases, as compared with the day before, there being sixty-one reported up to six p. m. The death-list, however, was the largest of any day since the last fatal case appearance there; twenty-six interments being reported for the same time. There was a great scarcity of nurses, and more were telegraphed for. The new cases in New Orleans numbered 163; death, thirty-three. Vicksburg was cut off from all communication with other points, except by the Mississippi River. The fever continues to spread, there being over fifty new cases and seventy-two deaths reported during the preceding twenty-four hours. Dr. Vearey telegraphed from Grenada to the Howard Association at New Orleans for more nurses, or others to help the sick the best they could. Provisions and nourishment for the sick were short. Several prominent men were down with the fever, and the negroes were all getting the disease, four of the latter were then dying for the lack of nourishment and domestic attention. All was needed in all the afflicted sections of the South, and the calls for assistance were being generously responded to from Northern and Western cities and towns. A Memphis dispatch of the 25th says instances were known in that city of parents deserting their children and children their parents. The wife and three children of a prominent citizen were taken with the fever during his absence from the city. He was telegraphed for by the Howards, and replied, "Take care of my family." His wife died and the children were removed to the City Hospital, where one of them died on the 26th. There were 100 new cases and twenty-six interments in Memphis on the 26th. Several negroes were among the victims. The new cases in Vicksburg numbered 149; interments, twenty-five. A telegram was received at New Orleans from Grenada, dated at noon, on the 26th, saying: "For Heaven's sake, send a few nurses! It is untrue that the material for the disease is exhausted; the nurses are exhausted. Two of the most eminent physicians have just been taken down. Physicians are needed with nurses, but not without." Another dispatch said Dr. Vearey was sick. A physician and four nurses were sent in response to this appeal. The new cases in New Orleans, on the 26th, numbered 128; deaths, forty-four. A man died in Cairo, on the 26th, of, it is supposed, yellow fever. He was from Memphis. A somewhat similar case occurred in Pittsburgh, the victim dying, on the 26th. The health report from the Surgeon-General's office, in Washington, on the 26th, gives the total of cases in New Orleans, so far, at 4,078; deaths, 534. Vicksburg, 450 cases and thirty-nine deaths. Memphis, 184 cases and fifty-three deaths during preceding six days. Canton, Miss., eighteen cases and eight deaths. Port Gibson, Miss., 16 cases and nine deaths. In Grenada, so many of the remaining population were stricken with the disease that definite information as to the number of cases and deaths could not be obtained.

THE POTTER INVESTIGATION.

MAJ. E. A. BURKE appeared before the Committee, on the 20th, and stated that the highest Tilden Electoral vote was 88,860, and the lowest Hayes Elector received 75,340, a difference of 8,810. The witness could not give the vote for Nicholls exactly, but he had a majority of 2,000 votes. The Returning Board threw out some 10,000 votes to count in the Hayes Electors. "In the campaign of 1874," said the witness, "we were cheated out of the election results by this same Returning Board in 1876. There was no change in their actions or principles. They were as arbitrary and unjust in 1876 as in 1874. Our agreements were increased by telegrams pouring in from all parts of Louisiana all over the country to these leaders in Louisiana, and showed us that they would sustain their men in any action that they took. The Louisiana rich got desperate after the election, and about gave it up, but when these telegrams commenced, and the visiting statesmen arrived, their spirits aroused, and they never seemed to falter from that out. The inauguration of Gov. Nicholls took place before some 50,000 persons, and the Senate and Assembly were at once organized. They took possession of everything except a small space filled by troops occupied by Packard." Witness went to Washington on the 6th of January to Nicholls' agent to secure non-intervention by the Federal troops, and got an assurance to that effect from Grant on the 21 of March. He did not know but that order was the result of a conference between Grant and Hayes. The people of Louisiana were not in favor of the Electoral Commission, because they thought if Hayes was recognized, it would logically follow that Packard was also elected. The witness further said: "When the hour of counting Tilden, whose vote was illegally rejected, passed away, on the 15th of February, we were in a terrible state of excitement. We held a meeting during the Legislature. Among some of the prominent men present was Senator Mathews, who was the representative of crime, the education of the ignorant negroes, the buying of votes, the bribery of officials, the stuffing of the ballot-boxes, the intimidation of the blacks, and white leaguers was not discussed between Mathews and myself. He and his party friends agreed to stand by us in counting in Hayes. They were assured by President Grant that after the count was completed the troops would be withdrawn. He said to Matthews that while he was opposed to the Electoral Commission, and of President Hayes' policy were well intended, yet he wanted these assurances from such men as Garfield, Morton and others, whom he regarded as friends of Hayes. Matthews said he could not answer for them, and witness said, 'Then we will place your party on a level with ours, and they must speak.'" Witness meant thereby that the Democratic people would join the Grant Louisiana and South Carolina being counted in Hayes. Witness further said that these were but two phases of the negotiations in this matter. Subsequently a meeting was held, and he made the same proposition of agreement to Governor Hayes and to Matthews and Key. In February, also, to Foster and other leading members of the Republican party. He was informed by Congress declining not to interfere with the Louisiana matter, that they were not a Republican administration, except some administration was made with the Democrats. Witness had a conversation with Foster and Hayes, and the latter said that he was determined to put the odium of the fraud on the members of the Legislature. He said the Democratic party were well aware of their determination to bring about the result. Witness had talked with the President on the 25th of February, and was informed that he would not do anything to prejudice the Republican party, and would not send troops there to control for Hayes. "Grant allowed us virtually to take possession of the State acted on these instructions and he submitted to them." Mr. Hill, of Louisiana, received a letter from Senator Lamar conveying to him tbiliai information which he (Lamar) obtained authentically, that he had promised to recognize the Nicholls Government in certain contingencies. He also stated in the form of the contents of the letter, a copy of which witness had given to the Committee. The witness continued: "Mr. Ellis proposed a conference meeting, which being leading Republicans all over the country to these leaders in Louisiana, and showed us that they would sustain their men in any action that they took. The Louisiana rich got desperate after the election, and about gave it up, but when these telegrams commenced, and the visiting statesmen arrived, their spirits aroused, and they never seemed to falter from that out. The bodies of two of the victims were mutilated past recognition, and the debris of the company's works were scattered over a large area.

A SPECIAL telegram from Washington, on the 21st, to the Chicago Tribune says the President had settled upon a policy as regards the Rio Grande border difficulties with Mexico, to the following effect: Raiders are to be pursued with increased vigor when they retreat to Mexican soil, and punished when caught, and the troops engaged in such pursuits will be increased from time to time. While not seeking a conflict with the Mexican regular forces, the commanding officer of the pursuing parties will not avoid one if such forces interfere. While on Mexican soil the pursuing forces will strictly confine themselves to the single object of pursuing the raiders, and take the utmost care to give no offense or cause of complaint to the Mexican authorities. No offense is meant by this to the Mexican Government, the design of the United States being simply to punish depredations upon its rights, upon its property and its citizens. Nothing which may occur on the south side of the Rio Grande as a result of the execution of this policy will be accepted by the Administration as an immediate cause of war between the two countries, but if the Mexican regular troops shall cross the river in retaliation for these measures a casus belli may be construed therefrom.

THERE were 21,472,500 of the new standard silver dollars coined up to the 10th of August. Of these 1,360,018 had been placed in circulation, leaving 19,679,487 on hand in the Government Treasury. A telegram to the Treasury Department at Washington telegram of the 22d says the demand for these dollars was slowly but steadily increasing.

A DISPATCH from Washington, on the 26th, says the southern cities had so far escaped the yellow fever. The Secretary of War had made liberal provisions for furnishing medicine to the destitute in the South, and orders were given on that day for a supply of 5,000 rations for Grenada. Liberal contributions were being made for the yellow-fever sufferers.

THERE were two cases of yellow fever discovered in Philadelphia, on the night of the 24th. A man died at the New York City quarantine hospital, on the 23d, of yellow fever, contracted while unloading a cargo of sugar.

At Memphis, on the 25th, the yellow-fever record showed a decrease in the number of new cases, as compared with the day before, there being sixty-one reported up to six p. m. The deaths, however, was the largest of any day since the fever made its appearance there; twenty-six interments being reported for the same time. There was a great scarcity of nurses, and more had been telegraphed for. The new cases in New Orleans numbered 169; deaths, thirty-three. Vicksburg was cut off from all communication with other points, except by the Mississippi River. The fever continues to spread, there being over fifty new cases and twenty-two deaths reported during the preceding twenty-four hours. Dr. Hearsey telegraphed from Grenada to the Howard Association at New Orleans for more nurses, or others to help the sick the best they could. Provisions and nourishment for the sick were short. Several prominent men were down with the fever, and the negroes were all getting the disease; four of the latter were then dying for the lack of nourishment and domestic attention. Aid was needed in all the afflicted sections of the South, and the call for assistance were being generally responded to from Northern and Western cities and towns. A Memphis dispatch of the 26th reported there were known in that city of parents describing their children and children their parents The wife and three children of a prominent citizen were taken with the fever during his absence from the city. He was telegraphed for by his family, and replied, "Take care of my family." His wife died and the children were conveyed to the City Hospital, where one of them died on the 25th. There were 96 new cases and twenty-six interments in Memphis, on the 26th. Several negroes were among the victims. The new cases in Vicksburg numbered 140; interments, twenty-five. A telegram was received at New Orleans from Grenada, dated at noon, on the 26th, saying: "For Heaven's sake, send a few nurses! It is untrue that the material for the disease is exhausted; the nurses are exhausted. Two of the most competent physicians have just been taken down. Physicians are needed with nurses, but not without." Another dispatch said: Dr. Veazey was sick. A physician and four nurses were sent in response to this appeal. The new cases in New Orleans, on the 26th, numbered 126; deaths, forty-four. A man died in Cairo, on the 24th, of, it is supposed, yellow fever. He was from Memphis. A somewhat similar case occurred in Pittsburgh, the victim dying, on the 25th. The health report from the Surgeon-General's Office, in Washington, on the 25th, gives the total of cases in New Orleans, so far, at 1,683; deaths, 581. Vicksburg, 460 cases and sixty-nine deaths. Memphis, 164 cases and fifty-three deaths during preceding six days. Canton, Miss., eighteen cases and eight deaths. Port Gibson, Miss., 19 cases and nine deaths. In Grenada, so many of the remaining population were stricken with the disease that definite information as to the number of cases and deaths could not be obtained.

OUR RADIX LETTER.

New York, Sept. 6, 1878.

BOSTON SENTINEL:

The ravages of the yellow fever continue to form one of the main subjects of thought and action in New York. Instead of decreasing, the two or three column reports which the daily papers give of the progress of the disease show it to be rather gaining around than otherwise. The sympathies of this city are fully aroused as may be inferred from the frequency of meetings and entertainments in behalf of the sufferers and the freedom with which money and goods are offered in the cause. Over $60,000 has been contributed, and the results of a system just put in operation will doubtless be to largely swell this amount. This system is the novel and sensible one of placing ballot boxes in numerous public places for the reception of such cash as citizens feel impelled to donate. The idea is a happy one. People can vote early and often and that without registration or naturalization. The papers urge "repeating" and "ballot stuffing" as among the most sacred duties of the community. No vote is challenged on account of age, color or previous condition of servitude, and not even the woman suffragists can complain of any tyrannous restriction of their rights. The result of this plan is not known as yet, but the idea seems to have struck the popular fancy, and will probably do good work.

Among the entertainments in behalf of the fever sufferers was one at Manhattan Beach, as a portion of old Coney Island has been recently named, and this reminds me to say that, of all the transformation scenes ever presented to wondering and delighted eyes, that which has occurred within one year on the sandy barren of Coney Island is a little the most miraculous. For many years this strip of sand has been a good deal frequented in the summer season on account of its nearness to New York and Brooklyn, but up to last season its patrons were mostly of the order which takes kindly to beer and pugilism, and of that other class who, open eyed and open mouthed, fall easy victims to the wiles of the thimble rigger and three-card monte man. But suddenly—indeed to us who have meanwhile been busy about other matters it seems to have been in the twinkling of an eye—the spot has been so changed that even its own father—the Atlantic Ocean—can hardly recognize it. Two enormous and sumptuous hotels have sprang like Aladdin's palace from the earth, together with a mass of pavilions, bathing houses, pagodas around all of which by a lavish expenditure of money the wilderness has been made to blossom like the rose. A net work of narrow-gauge railroads has been laid to connect New York and Brooklyn with the new watering place, the suddenness and immensity of whose popularity are proportionate to the miraculous quickness of its growth. It far outstrips Long Branch and Cape May both in elegance and in the multitude of its patrons. The passenger traffic between it and the city is something wonderful. On some evenings there have been as many as 150,000 people in the hotels and along the beach; while in gayety and dazzling brilliancy the scene is only comparable to such European watering places as Baden-Baden or Wiesbaden which latter however lack the invigorating sight and sound of the ocean.

Powerful electric lights illuminate the beach and grounds at night and throw a weirdly beautiful radiance over the white capped surf and the bathers disporting themselves therein, while bands of music from the pagodas contribute to the general enjoyment. One of these bands includes Levy, the great cornetist, and its pagoda is the nucleus of a crowd reaching usually well up into the thousands. Occasionally, as was the case one evening this week, the bench for nearly a mile is made to blaze with fireworks of a quality and in a profusion heretofore known only to the gay capitals of Europe. The season is now drawing fast to its close, but as yet there is little falling off observable either in the crowds or the attractions of the place.

The past week was the last in the eventful life of our National Bankrupt Law, and has probably been the liveliest one of its existence. The unfortunate merchant, the tricky speculator, the hapless real estate owner whose handsome fortune in "equities" has faded into thin air and the brazen fraud who habitually takes advantage of the statute cheat his creditors about every other year and who has been the main cause of its repeal—all these representative applicants for relief have thronged the halls of justice and jostled each other in their eagerness to secure eleventh hour salvation. Henceforth insolvent debtors will have to stand or fall by their record, and the shameless impositions which the dead act has rendered possible will be so no longer. Not that this repeal is going to put a stop to defrauding creditors. There is no such luck as that for the commercial world this side of the millennium, but at least the tactics of the wicked will have to be changed somewhat, and the way of the transgressor be made more healthfully difficult.

In a few weeks New York has got to submit to a great and humiliating loss. Theodore Thomas, who for fifteen years has worked in this city, and whose orchestra and concerts have been the chief pride of the town, musically speaking, for a not much shorter period, has become weary of the persistent failure of the metropolis to afford him proper support in his arduous and useful labors and has signed a contract with certain gentlemen of Cincinnati, by virtue of which he will soon distaund his incomparable orchestra, shake off from his feet the dust of Gotham and take up his abode in the former city, where a lucrative and honorable position awaits him as director of a new and complete Conservatory of music on the model of the best schools of Europe. New York ought to be ashamed of herself, and to do her justice, so she is. But it is too late for repentance. Thomas is as good as gone, and I fear it will be long before we shall look upon his like again.

The Essex Market Police Court of this town has a curiously complicated case of larceny on its hands. The prisoner is a young woman occupied in attendant at a bath establishment. A lady came to the place for a dash, before entering which she gave a little bag of valuables containing among other things a $400 ring, into the custody of the present prisoner. When the lady reclaimed her little bag she found her sparkling jewel was not. Although search of the bath and premises was made with assistance of the attendant, but no ring was found, whereupon the victim accused the girl of stealing it, and had her arrested. The latter pleaded innocence and persisted therein till the next day, when she complained of feeling sick, and confessed to her startled keepers that she had swallowed the missing ornament. A physician was called and every effort made to recover the property, but up to date the ring has not been brought to light. Further developments are anxiously awaited by all parties concerned.

Yellow Fever—How the Disease Advances.

From a paper prepared by Dr. Henry Smith, of the United States Marine-Hospital Service, the following conclusions are taken as to yellow fever. Dr. Smith was in charge of the yellow-fever patients at Savannah and Brunswick, Ga., during the epidemic in 1876:

Although the morbific element in yellow fever has not as yet been determined by our outward senses, observation points to the belief that it exists in living germs, propagated without the body, but which can be studied only by their effects on the human organism. In illustration of this position, the following facts may be cited:

1. The disease is certainly transportable, through fomites, from an infected to a healthy and distant locality.

2. Individuals, alone and apart from fomites, fail to spread the disease in a healthy locality.

3. The disease is known to extend gradually from existing foci of infection, like the army-worm on cultivated plantations.

4. Testimony has been for years accumulating, to the conclusion that the disease may be arrested and extinguished, in infected localities, by the use of agents destructive to the low forms of life.

It may be here observed that on the last point proof has been amply made through the system of disinfection, as practiced for past years by the Board of Health of Louisiana.

The following are valuable, and probably represent the very latest theories regarding the action and propagation, under certain favoring conditions, of this most formidable of diseases:

1. That the poison is not of a caseous nature, but attacks itself to the skin, to vaginal and to exposed surfaces generally.

2. That the disease propagates from centers along surfaces equally in all directions, as often as not, currents of air as with them.

3. That the poison exists in the gravest some time before development.

4. That the germs, whether animal or vegetable, must have existed, in more or less force, for an indefinite period previous to the moment at which the development of the disease takes place.

It has been also ascertained that yellow fever advances from local force at the rate of about forty feet per day, as the disease, therefore, has a constant tendency to spread, the whole space over which it could have extended must be disinfected in order to check its advance from the point at which it had its origin. To determine the area over which disinfectants should be used, it is only necessary to add four to the number of days since the disease manifested itself, and multiply by forty—the rate per day at which the disease progresses from a given center.

The disease was tolerated sometimes with, and at other times without, ventilation, but usually there was experienced a feeling of uneasiness preceding the onset of the disease, and in most of the cases a chilly sensation, rarely with a marked shaking chill; great depression and lassitude; pain in the back and head, general; likewise sometimes in the tonsils, or either or all at the same time, occasionally accompanied by spasms in the lower extremities similar to those of asiatic cholera, with nausea or a tendency to vomit, while slight or entire absence of pain or chill characterized many of the milder attacks. This chilly feeling soon merged into the fever, much being then with shifting fever-action of a chronic and malignant character from the first, in many instances attacking the brain, and not terminating under three days. The fever cases were unusually long in convalescing, and especially prone to relapses on the slightest imprudence. Many cases, and particularly the relapsed, required twenty, thirty and even fifty days, to one instance, the longest that I had seen during the epidemic, one of the first seen on my arrival, and convalescence fully established at the date of my departure, occupied a period of upward of six weeks.

The skin was hot and dry. The temperature of the body much higher than in the ordinary fevers. The pulse full and strong, "bounding," rapid, 120 to 140, and in the sanguine cases, sometimes dirty, but usually presenting a dark, flabby appearance. With a few the tongue was moist, with others, dry, red, pointed, occasionally coated, sometimes painted with dryness of the mouth and fauces, and great thirst; with a few, assuming cases for a time the form of cold water.

The average duration of the febrile paroxysm or active stage was ascertained to be about two days and a half; the shortest twelve, and the longest 100 hours. This state was usually preceded by a corresponding depression of all the mental powers, greater into the calm stage, and constituting the stage of depression. The pulse has been known often to fall in the interval of beats from 130 or 135 to 80, 70, 50 and even to 40 beats in the minute, for an almost incredible short space of time—the temperature again becoming natural with some, and in others still keeping up, bearing no relation to the lowest state of the pulse.

In the grave or severer cases the face presented a suffused or reddish appearance, with the eyes highly injected. Extreme restlessness or great alarm was often present in the patient half unconscious, struggling to get out of bed, culminating occasionally in furious delirium, but generally of a subter character; while profound stupor often marked the last stages. In a few deaths more than witnessed but a ray of thought was manifest; in others the intellect was retained to the last.

The perspirations were variable—sometimes only partial, at others irregular, occasionally offensive. The usual appearance of the skin was clear and natural, but sometimes very dark, afterward yellow; the latter unusually rare. In many of the fatal cases, simultaneously with active pain and sudden and many vomits, the skin was often covered with bluish or black blotches, increasing in frequency and size after death, on admixture even before the fatal termination. Intense exanthematous abscesses and eruptions on the face sometimes succeeded, but were not so frequent as I had witnessed in previous epidemics. The desquamation of the cuticle was quite common, especially on the hands, face and feet. While a correct diagnosis was occasionally difficult, the tongue, breath and gums were generally of all the characteristics of the disease. Black vomit was frequent, and it was a noticeable fact that numerous cases recovered from it in a large proportion of cases the poison determined to the kidneys early in the disease, frequently giving rise to suppression of the urinary secretion, and death followed on the third or fourth day, proving more fatal even than black vomit. Generally the urine was on the first day free and of a red color, late in the disease having a turbid appearance, and still later—the fourth or fifth day—dark, reddish and sometimes muddy. In severe cases albumen was present after the second or third day, and, in the still severer or fatal cases, in an amount surprisingly large.

Elijah's Advice.

A little woman, with a tear trembling on the end of her nose, entered the parlor, sank into the red rocking-chair and timidly asked:

"Mr. Jey, can I trust you?"

"Madam, you can! In prosperity reply. "I don't like to hear a man praise himself, but I believe I can go to any grocery in Detroit and get trusted for one dozen clothes-pins without having to leave any security whatever. I now have in my possession thirty-five cents which were handed me by a stranger driven to jail with some quiet remonstrance. I hope to be bald-headed all my days! Yes, madam you can trust me."

"I—I was married about three years ago," began the woman, after considerable hesitation.

"Don't doubt it in the least, madam, and I suppose it was a case of love?"

"It seemed so. My husband seemed to think everything of me, and I know I almost worshiped him. We were very, very happy until a year ago."

"Yes, I suppose so, madam. As Milton says:

"'He called me his turtle—his angel—
I thought like the fourse on earth;
And we'll dance all night 'till broad daylight,
And—and—and so forth.'

"A few months ago," she softly continued, "he began finding fault because I did not use more big words in talking, and he said that my grammar was perfectly awful. Not a day passed that he does not upbraid me and sometimes I even wish I were dead!"

"Madam, does he find any fault with your cooking?"

"No, not any."

"And in making the bed you don't get the foot the highest?"

"Oh, no."

"And he never finds buttons off his shirts—never comes home to meals and finds the stove cold, and you gossiping over the gate?"

"He never has to wait one minute for any of his meals, sir."

"Your husband had no fault to find for a year or two—didn't seem to notice your lack of big words while the honey-moon lasted?"

"No."

"Very well, madam, your husband's coat is too big to fit him in the back, but I think we can put another on him. Now, then, will you do as I tell you to?"

"Oh, sir, I couldn't poison him—couldn't do such a thing!" she exclaimed.

"Pizen, madam! Do I resemble a fiend? Do I seem like a murderer? I don't want you to kill him, but I want to help you win back his love and get his nose down where it used to be. What time do you have supper?"

"At six sir!"

"Well, you go home from here and upset two or three chairs in the sitting-room, toss the broom out-doors, scatter the contents of the work-basket around the house and make things look as if there had been a tramp meeting held there; put in just half enough tea, burn your biscuit, and for sauce cut up the hardest peaches you can find in the market. As he comes home, have an old dress on and your hair down, and the minute he enters the house you must remark that 'the loveliness of the evening seems to percolate the entire outastrophe of the hygienic influence.' Big words, you see—grammar till his hair stands up! If he finds fault with the supper, tell him that the encumbrance appears to elucidate the tarantula, and if that doesn't fetch him you can continue to affiliate with the pabulistic enigma. Give him big words and big biscuits—XXX grammar and sloppy tea, and I'll bet five hundred bugs against a penny whistle that he'll get up from that table with his nose as low down as the mercury in January."

"Mr. Jey, I'll try it!" she exclaimed, as she rose up.

"Never known to fail—money refunded if it doesn't work," he replied.

Her eyes sparkled, a flush came to her cheeks, and she went out, saying:

Bijah leaned back, rubbed the down off a Crawford peach, and growled:

"Yes, that's so, and if all wifely folders my advice that husband will dream to-night that he's a grammar, and that four sheriffs are running him across lots into the river. I've been right that!"—Detroit Free Press.

Why Time Seems Long or Short.

We do not believe, indeed, that the self-consciousness or otherwise of our states of mind has much to do with the matter. The real condition on which the rapidity or slowness of time, as it passes, depends, is mere reality in the point on which the desire of the moment is fixed. Take two very common cases. You are driving to meet some train or arriving by train, quite sure of being in time, or even far too early, so eager are you for the moment when you will meet the person coming by the train. The drive itself may seem interminable, as well as the time which has to elapse after you reach, before the train comes, for you are not interested in the objects you pass, but only eager for the expiration of the time between your present position and the moment you wish to reach. Here, time is your enemy, as it were. You want to kill the time, and the time seems unendurably long. But take another case. You are driving to a train which you have little or no hope of catching, but the most eager desire to catch—driving against time. Here the point desired is to reach the train before the minute comes at which, as you know, it is advertised to start. The consequence is that what you desire is not the annihilation of any interval of time, but the extension to recover moments than in ordinary cases it will cover. As you hold your watch in your hand, the objects on the road seem to pass with intolerable slowness, and at the same time the hand of your watch seems to move with intolerable rapidity. You think the hand never moved so fast before, while you probably objurgate the cabman for his cautious and slow driving. Here, two more events you can crowd into a given time the better you are pleased. What you desire is to crowd in more, and the consequence is that time appears to fly too fast for your wishes. Now, we cannot see that there is more of self-consciousness in one state than the other. In both alike the desire is fixed on a future event. But in the first case the interoscillate events are of a nature which you have no occasion to watch, which happen in their prescribed order without your noticing them, and the consequence is that time stretches itself as a tedious gulf between you and the desired moment; in the second case, the intermediate events are all events which, as you well know, must not only happen in their given order, but happen at a very much more rapid rate than usual, if your desire is to be satisfied; the consequence is that the thing on which your desire fixes itself is the rate at which they happen, and, naturally enough, time appears to be short to you. It is not because it is so long, but because it flies so quickly, and does not give them, as it seems, a fair chance of happening. And so, in the one case, you accuse it of going slowly, in the other of flying fast.

And we believe that this is, in fact, the reason why childhood seems to pass so slowly, comparatively, with youth and manhood—at all events, to all those children who have a strong sense of something in them which none of the guarded and dependent life of childhood satisfies. The events of still immature faculties, the enormous disproportion between wishes and powers, the comparison between the easy way in which grown-up people dispose of your life and your own secret wishes in relation to it, make it seem that almost every worth living for—at least set to an ambitious child, and most children are more or less ambitious—is in the unattainable future, when you are to dispose of your own destiny. Your desire is fixed on something, the only condition of which appears to be the passage of a dreary gulf of time. It is like waiting at a railway-station till the train by which you are to go departs. It positively is unnatural, on the contrary, you are concerned with the present. Often you rather reproach time with being too short for that which you wish to crowd into it. Comparatively seldom, indeed, is mankind a time of mere waiting for the future, as childhood so often is with children, whose practical powers are—or rather are to be—much larger than their stores of thought, and whose hopes are as yet undeveloped, and merely waiting to ripen. Assuredly Campbell's solution of the problem he himself set is neither true nor false. It is unintelligible:

"Heaven gives our years of failing strength
Indeed with lingering heaviness,
And those of youth a seeming length,
Proportioned to their sweetness."

The sweetness has little to do with it. The longest years of childhood are usually the dreariest and not the sweetest years—the years most desperately filled, not those most adequately filled. The seeming length of time depends on the point from which the heart is fixed. If that point be at a distance, and the mind is little concerned with what is actually happening except to wish it over, the time seems long. If that point is too near for what you know must happen, in case you wish it to be gratified in the interval, the time seems short. And that is, we believe, the true explanation of most of the unsatisfactory experiences of the varying length of time which every man, by a little questioning of his memory, can summon up.—London Spectator.

PERSONAL AND LITERARY.

—The Rev. Robert Ashton, the editor of the "Congregational Year Book" since its first publication in 1849, has died in England in the eighty-first year of his age.

—Templeton, the Boston correspondent of the Hartford Courant, draws this gem picture of Kearney: "Kearney is not a bad-looking person. He is a man of good type of a class that may be seen in any large city. He is intelligent after his manner, but not at all extraordinarily so; is fluent in speech; has a good voice, and, it is not unlikely, honestly thinks he has a mission to reform politics and redress the grievances of the laboring classes."

—The late Mr. Reese, the California millionaire, was never known to keep horses or carriage unless he had to evidently in traile. He would wait ten minutes at a street corner before getting into a car in the hope of meeting an acquaintance who would pay his fare. When taunted by a friend one day in regard to his miserly habits he said: "Well, I can't help it; I know it's foolish, but it's a disease I've got." In all matters not connected with money he was a man of great intelligence and liberality.

—Mrs. Oliver, whose suit against Ex-Senator Cameron for breach of promise to marry her ended in a verdict for the following strange letter to the District Commissioners of Washington:

"To the Commissioners: Sirs: I saw you on Saturday. I am obliged to be my complaint before you and ask your protection. Through the influence of Mr. Rodgers and members of Congress I obtained a position in the Patent Office, but was discharged. I am the lady who brought suit against Hon. Simon Cameron. I needn't name one has interfered and has been the cause of my discharge. As much has been said on he persons who looked for commission. Hon [illegible] from Mr. Cameron. I wish, therefore, to put myself under your protection should anything more occur to injure me. Mr. Cameron brought me here and now I am far from friends, who have been lost in consulting with Mr. Cameron, I wish to make this my home and am a widow having lived all my days in Washington. I am the only person I have to depend on. I am a respectable person and desire to prove a gentleman to protect me."

INCIDENTS AND ACCIDENTS.

—A Willimantic (Conn.) girl, employed in a thread factory, wrote her name and the words, "Wanted, a husband," on a spool recently, and when it had been wound with thread, it was sent to a South Norwalk shoe factory, where it fell into a Ridgefield man's hands. He began a correspondence the girl replied that she was engaged, but would find him another as good as she, and a marriage is the result, to take place as a result of the spool's message.

—As Jacob Landis, of Erwin, N. Y., was twisting a wisp around a sheaf of wheat, the other day, a large rattlesnake sprang from the straw, directly toward his face. The farmer mechanically threw his hand out and caught the snake around the neck, just in time to prevent its fastening its fangs in his nose. He held the snake firmly in his hand and called for aid. A companion ran up and cut the serpent's head off with his scythe. The rattlesnake had wound itself so tightly about Landis' bare arm that a round red mark on the flesh showed every coil. The snake was three and a half feet long and had nine rattles.

—A Norwich man saw, the other evening, a swallow whose actions resembled him of a playful nature with a mouse. The bird was in pursuit of a gaudily-colored butterfly, and as it chased the tiny insect over the fields and through the hay-cocks, the observer noticed that as often as the butterfly was caught by the bird it was ejected from its mouth, and the chase, with all its features of hot pursuit, capture and escape, was repeated a score of more times. Whether the bird thought it tired of its sport, desired to end the contest with a swoop, caught it in its beak and quickly devoured it.—New Haven Palladium.

—A strange accident occurred to-day on the Springfield, Jackson & Pomeroy Narrow-Gauge near Bainbridge. The train which arrives at Bainbridge at noon remains thirty minutes for dinner. To-day the engine was left standing on the track as usual while the engineer and fireman went to a house about 100 yards distant to get their meal. They had been gone but a short time when a man named A. Pepper pulled the pin connecting the engine with the train, climbed into the cab, and pulled the throttle wide open. The engine shot down the track like an arrow until it reached a curve about a mile from Bainbridge, when it jumped, rolled over on its side, and became a complete wreck. Pepper was instantly killed. What his motive was for so strange a deed is a mystery. He had at one time been a well-to-do farmer, but had squandered his means by dissipation. Some of the citizens think he chose that as a method of committing suicide; others, that it was temporary, half-drunken freak.—Cincinnati Dispatch.

Cases of Drowning—Suggestions.

It may have struck the readers of the Sun that its reports of deaths from drowning have been unusually numerous this season. Many of the cases have been very sad ones, as little would have saved the victims. No one who has not been a witness of an accident of the kind, and seen the very agony experienced by the principal in one, can imagine the short space of time within which death by drowning occurs and all the efforts for resuscitation prove futile. Frequently the whole thing is over and the person drowned before the spectators have recovered from their bewilderment or realized the fatal character of the disaster. In one minute and a half the lifeless, warm-blooded animal undergoing drowning is suspended, and is not finally extinguished if proper remedies are immediately and vigorously used. Even in that brief space of time the lungs are in a state of collapse. The arterial blood has been converted in a great measure into venous, and is incapable of any longer maintaining the principal organs. But up to this time life is not extinct. It is only suspended. The rescuer, however, must be prompt. Life, as we have said, is apparently quenched in one minute and a half. After the lapse of ten, or at the utmost five, the victim is considered beyond recovery. In no instance, it is authoritatively asserted, where the experiment has been fully and fairly tried, has a drowned person been found capable of resuscitation after an hour and a half's submersion. It is a popular belief that water gets into the lungs and stomach, and much time often taken to get rid of it. In fact, very little water finds its way into either.

The first thing an apparently drowned person requires is air. The second, warmth and circulation. The efforts to restore breathing must be commenced immediately and energetically. They must be persevered in for one or two hours, or until a medical man has pronounced life to be extinct. Efforts to promote warmth and circulation, beyond removing the wet clothing and drying the skin, must not be made until the first appearance of natural breathing, for if the circulation of the blood be induced before breathing has commenced, the restoration of life will be endangered. Therefore, although blankets and warm clothing should be immediately sent for, they should not be used at once.

To restore breathing, place the body on the ground, face downward, with one of the arms under the head, and, observing that the tongue falls forward, leaving the windpipe free. If there be only slight breathing, on none at all, turn the body on the side, rest the face and chest and duch cold water on them. Excite the nostrils with smelling-salts, if at hand. All this must be done without the loss of a moment. If it fail, replace the body face-downward, support the chest by a folded coat or other article, turn the body gently on the side and a little over, and then keep turning it quickly on the face and back again, about fifteen times to the minute, now and then varying the side. On each occasion when the body is turned upon its face, keep up a uniform but brisk pressure between the shoulder-blades, removing the pressure immediately before turning it on its side. These are all simple measures, and we have put them in the plainest words, so that all can understand what is first to be done in a case of drowning and how to do it, without waiting for a physician. If breathing is thus restored, everybody knows how to promote circulation by warm blankets, hot bottles and rubbing. When the blood circulates, the patient may be given a teaspoonful of warm water, and, if it is swallowed, a small quantity of wine, brandy, coffee or other stimulant. Then he should be put to bed and a disposition to sleep encouraged. A word of caution, which, in the hurry and excitement incident to such danger on circumstances roll the body over a barrel or hold it up by the feet, under the impression that a prejudicial notion that it drains the water out; never allow the body to remain on its back, nor place it in a warm bath, unless under the mildest of warnings and through the agency of a physician, and then only as a momentary excitant. We do not repeat the more technical directions to be followed in the case of nervous prostration, with all its features of hot pursuit, capture and escape, was repeated a score of more times. Whether the bird thought it tired of its sport, desired to end the contest with a swoop, caught it in its beak and quickly devoured it.—New Haven Palladium.

—A strange accident occurred to-day on the Springfield, Jackson & Pomeroy Narrow-Gauge near Bainbridge. The train which arrives at Bainbridge at noon remains thirty minutes for dinner. To-day the engine was left standing on the track as usual while the engineer and fireman went to a house about 100 yards distant to get their meal. They had been gone but a short time when a man named A. Pepper pulled the pin connecting the engine with the train, climbed into the cab, and pulled the throttle wide open. The engine shot down the track like an arrow until it reached a curve about a mile from Bainbridge, when it jumped, rolled over on its side, and became a complete wreck. Pepper was instantly killed. What his motive was for so strange a deed is a mystery. He had at one time been a well-to-do farmer, but had squandered his means by dissipation. Some of the citizens think he chose that as a method of committing suicide; others, that it was temporary, half-drunken freak.—Cincinnati Dispatch.

OUR RADIX LETTER.

EDITOR SENTINEL:

The New York Herald, our great sensation paper, of whose sporting and un-American proprietor I have several times had occasion to tell your readers something, has recently broken out in a new spot. In publishing a statement of its circulation, which it claims to be the largest in the country, some days ago, it took occasion to make a violent onslaught on Geo P. Rowell & Co. and their American Newspaper Directory, for both of whom the Herald professes a violent and rather overdone that the "Chambermaids' organ" held itself so high as to be quite oblivious of anything that might be said about it by any one; but this outburst shows that Rowell & Co.'s statement in the Directory cut too near the truth to be pleasant, and the Great American polo-player is furious. Immediately upon the Herald's publication of its figures, the Sun challenged it to submit to an examination of the books of both institutions by a committee of newspaper men, agreeing if the Herald made good its claims to forfeit $1,000. Messrs Rowell & Co. at once came forward and offered to swell the amount to $5,000—as an inducement to the Herald to "put up or shut up." But the latter did neither. It declined the Sun's proposition, but challenged Rowell & Co. to a somewhat different test, the penalty of the beaten party to be a $25,000 forfeit to the Metropolitan Museum of Art. Rowell & Co. promptly accepted the challenge, and at the same time made the Herald four other propositions, each of which displayed such confidence in the latter's lack of veracity that it was thought the paper must in self-defence accept at least one of them. Instead of this it ignored them all, and contented itself by throwing a little mud at its inquisitors, claiming that Rowell's Directory was merely a scheme for blackmailing the newspapers of the country. Thus the "great American newspaper" places itself in an unenviable position. It fails to back up its assertions and it is guilty of slander. As a newspaper man, I happen to know that Rowell's Directory is neither to be bought nor intimidated, and that it is the most fearless and truthful work of the kind in the country.

Kearney is spreading. He has come to New York, and greatly astonished the clerk of the hotel at which he was stopping by asking his way to the Astor Library. His purpose, doubtless, was to hunt up fresh adjectives to hurl at the "moon eyed, leprous sons of Blostrul Bondholders" with capital B's.

Dennis proves himself an alien to this class by always taking up a collection for his own special benefit at the close of each harangue. After the hat has been passed around, and when the genuine jargon has gone from his listeners' ears, his hearers must wonder what it all amounts to anyway and whether they got their money's worth.

RADIX.

Charlevoix as a Summer Resort.

"But to speak of summer resorts again, there is no more beautiful spot, so acceptable to the people of Michigan especially, than Charlevoix. It is delightfully situated and reminds a New Englander of some portions of New Hampshire and Vermont. On one side Lake Michigan, on the other a chain of beautiful inland lakes, with cool breezes always blowing in one direction or the other, extremely hot days are never known. These inland lakes extend some 15 miles in a south easterly direction, and are navigated by a daily line of steamers. The lakes are lined with flourishing farms on either side by scenery the most picturesque and lovely. Hudson river scenery can scarcely parrival it in beauty. These lakes connect with the Jordan and Boyne rivers, the former stream being navigable with small boats for twelve or fifteen miles. From these rivers and small creeks that abound in this region an abundance of brook trout can be caught. About ten miles up the Jordon is a log hotel kept by a Mr. Webster, a favorite resort for pleasure seekers. He has the reputation of keeping a No. 1 house. At Charlevoix an association has been formed, composed chiefly of Baptists of Kalamazoo. Dr. Brooks and John Pigg of Kalamazoo College being among the leading spirits. The name of the association, which is incorporated is the Charlevoix summer resort. It is not intended to be denominational, but unsectarian in its plan and object. This association owns 25 acres of land situated about one mile from the village on a beautiful terrace overlooking Pine Lake. Any one paying ten dollars becomes a member of the association, and can select a lot 50x100 I think upon which to build. He must, however, build within 2 years or he forfeits his claim. The object is not to dispose of the land but build up a summer resort. This is the first season of the existence of this society, but already some fifteen cottages have been erected, and as many more will be erected next summer. Their cost ranges from about fifty to three hundred dollars each. It is proposed to erect a summer hotel on the grounds another season, for the accomodation of those living in the cottages, who could take their meals there, and for transient boarders.

This season the hotel at Charlevoix, and nearly every private house, has been filled with boarders. The officers of the association have erected bathing houses along the lake shore, and a wharf has just been completed, at which steamers touch daily. I was informed by Dr Brooks that it was not designed to make of this resort a camp-meeting ground like Petoskey, but simply a summer resort of a nonsectarian character, where the hot weeks of summer could be passed in quiet and rest. Though the people comprising this resort are chiefly from Kalamazoo, at present, persons from various parts of the State of different theological proclivities will create cottages another season. All members have half-fare privileges for themselves and families on the railroad line ending at Petoskey. Charlevoix is easily reached by stage from Petoskey or by the Goodrich Steamer, Menominee, Capt. Kirtland, or by the North Western Transportation line of Steamers. I feel sure that the natural attractions of Charlevoix are such, its fishing facilities so abundant and its air so cool, healthful and refreshing that whoever visits the place once will give it preference over either Petoskey or Mackinaw as a place of summer resort. Let me add that mosquitoes are unknown at Charlevoix."

An Undeniable Truth

You deserve to suffer, and if you lead a miserable, unsatisfactory life in this beautiful world, it is entirely your own fault and there is only one excuse for you,—your unreasonable prejudice and skepticism, which has killed thousands. Personal knowledge and common sense reasoning will soon show you that Green's August Flower will cure you of Liver Complaint, or Dyspepsia, with all its miserable effects, such as sick headache, palpitation of the heart, sour stomach, habitual costiveness, dizziness of the head, nervous prostration, low spirits, &c. Its sales now reach every town on the Western Continent and not a Druggist but will tell you of its wonderful cures. You can buy a Sample Bottle for 10 cents. Three dose a will relieve you.

THE SENTINEL.

General News Summary.

DOMESTIC.

THE Secretary of the Interior, on the 8d, rendered an additional decision to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in respect to railroad land grants. An appeal had been taken in the Duluth case for a reversion or suspension of the former decision, but Secy Schurz declined to do either, and the first decision, by which large tracts of land, covered by land-grants to railroads, were opened to settlement, is to stand unless reversed by a decision of the courts. Immense numbers of applications had been made to enter the lands under the original decision, and it was expected the railroad companies would take immediate steps to appeal to the courts.

THE Farmers' and Mechanics' Savings Bank, of San Francisco, failed, on the 31. The amount owing its depositors is stated to be $800,000. The bank officers say them will be paid in full.

THE average condition of oats throughout the country, as shown by the August returns to the Agricultural Department, was represented by the figures 94 as that of tobacco as reported from twelve of the largest tobacco-growing States, was about 80.

THE Secretary of the United States Treasury has issued a formal circular announcing that hereafter silver dollars will be issued, in sums not less than $1,000 nor more than $10,000, in exchange for gross backs, upon application at any Sub-Treasury or designated depository, and that National Bank notes presented for redemption will be redeemed in silver dollars.

SEC'Y SHERMAN, on the 4th, issued the seventieth call for the redemption of 5-20 bonds of 1865. The call is for $2,000,000 coupon and $3,000,000 registered bonds, principal and interest to be paid on and after Dec. 4.

THE Grand Central Hotel, at Omaha, was completely destroyed by fire on the evening of the 4th. This hotel was built in 1873 at a cost of $300,000, although it was sold recently under foreclosure for $130,000. Four firemen were killed and several others seriously hurt by falling walls.

THE Chicago Inter-State Exposition was formally opened on the evening of the 4th, in the presence of a multitude numbering 15,000 persons. The display was vastly superior, it is stated, to any that has preceded it. The Exposition will close on the 19th of October.

A STRIKE of the car-drivers on the Third Avenue Street Railroad, New York City, was ordered, on the 6th, by the company agreeing to pay them $2 00 per day. A strike was in progress on the Second Avenue line.

DURING the week ending Sept. 7, the National Firemen's Tournament was held in Chicago. The Barnes Hose Company, of Ripon, Wis., secured the first prize of $500, a nickel-plated horse-cart and the National champion hose belt. Other first and second prizes were secured by companies from Indianapolis, Indiana, Michigan and Wisconsin. The attendance was very large, and the numerous prizes satisfactorily distributed.

A LIGHT fall of snow occurred in portions of Wyoming Territory, on the 8th. The thermometer at Cheyenne indicated a temperature of 32 deg.

YELLOW-FEVER NEWS.

AN appeal, in behalf of the stricken sections of the South, signed by Congressmen Ellis and Gibson, of Louisiana; Senator Morgan, of Alabama; Wm. H. Mcardle, of Mississippi, and Lyon Bussey, Professor of the New Orleans Chamber of Commerce, was issued on the 8th. After alluding to the generous contributions already made in the different cities and sections of the Union, the appeal goes on to say that, great as has been the charity, the necessity is yet greater. At New Orleans, Vicksburg and Memphis, as well as in the smaller Towns of Holly Springs, Grenada, Port Gibson, Canton, Greenville, Brandon, Baton Rouge and Delhi, all business was suspended, and large numbers of poor employees were deprived of the labor necessary for the support of themselves and families. Of these unemployed poor there were in New Orleans about 15,000; Memphis, 5000; Vicksburg, 2,000, and in the smaller towns 2,000—27,000 in all—most of whom are heads of families, and represent a total population of not less than 105,000 in actual and desolate want. These people have no means of getting away from the pestilential cities, and for them there is no labor, no wages, no bread. And the condition would probably continue for at least fifty days, for there will be no city of the pestilence and no resumption of business until frost. The cost for subsistence alone for the people for fifty days will aggregate over $1,000,000, saying nothing for medicine, clothing and proper sustenance for the sick and the burial of the dead. It is suggested that central depots be established in the great cities of the Union for the reception of further supplies for the needy and suffering regions, where all contributions may be sent as fast as raised, and that they be forwarded to New Orleans as a central point, to be sent from there, under the auspices of the Howard and Peabody Associations, to their final destination. Free transportation by land and water is offered for all supplies for the stricken cities. The appeal concludes as follows: "In the name of common country and kindred humanity, we invoke for our stricken, dying and starving people, the charity of those whose homes and loved ones are secure from the pestilence that walketh in darkness and the destruction that wasteth at noonday."

GOV. CULLOM, of Illinois, issued a proclamation, on the 7th, calling for further aid for the suffering people, and Hon. Bishop, of Ohio, designated the 18th as a day of united prayer, throughout the State, for Divine interposition in behalf of the stricken regions.

A STATEMENT was published, on the 7th, by the Young Men's Christian Association of New Orleans, to the effect that, while they were in full sympathy and cordially co-operated with the Howard and Peabody Associations, they were an independent and responsible organization for the dispensing of funds committed to their hands. They had so far done their work efficiently, economically and faithfully, and would continue so doing. They ask the fullest recognition throughout the country as an effective channel through which the benefactions of the charitable can be dispensed.

THE number of new cases reported in New Orleans, for the forty-eight hours ending on the 8th, was 495; deaths, 158. The fever was increasing at Vicksburg, and there was no abatement in the spread of the disease at Grenada and several other points. In Mobile the fever was still to be very at Hickman, Ky., and the physicians there had the disease under control.

THE total number of cases of yellow fever in the various infected points, up to the 7th, is reported at 13,848; deaths, 3,434.

MEMPHIS dispatches of the 9th report the condition of affairs in that city as being desperate in the extreme and continually growing worse. The new cases reported for the previous twenty-four hours numbered 411, the undertakers reporting 112 interments. There was no hope of staying the plague, the only seeming remedy being the compulsory driving of the people from the city. To this end, no rations were issued, except to persons who had sick cases in the family. Camps would be formed outside the infected section, and those expecting rations would be compelled to take up their residence there until the disease should be dissipated. The call for nurses was greater than could be supplied.

ONE HUNDRED AND FOURTEEN new cases and eighty-seven deaths were reported in New Orleans, on the 9th. The Peabody Association issued over 5,000 rations on that day.

IT was reported from Jackson (Miss.), on the 9th, that the fever had broken out at several new points in that State, and that there was an outbreak at Vicksburg, Holly Springs, Port Gibson or Greenville.

FIVE members of Thomas Porter's family, four miles above Cairo, Ill., on the Mississippi River, were said to be down with the fever, on the 9th.

PERSONAL AND POLITICAL.

GEN. LEW WALLACE, of Indiana, was, on the 31, appointed Governor of New Mexico, vice ARTH, suspended.

ON the 3d, the House of Bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church, in session in New York City, adopted a preamble and resolution deposing from the ministry Bishop McCoskery, of the Presiding Bishop, of Kentucky, formally declared such deposition.

THE State election in Vermont was held on the 31. It was thought, on the morning of the 4th, that Proctor (Rep.), for Governor, would have about 17,000 majority. The Republican candidates for Congress in the 1st and 2d Districts were probably elected. No choice in the 3d.

THE Northwestern Exposition, at Minneapolis, Minn., was formally opened, on the 31. Senator Blaine made the inaugural address. There were 25,000 persons present.

THE Republicans of Minnesota held their State Convention at St. Paul, on the 4th. John M. Berry was renominated for Associate-Judge of the Supreme Court, Samuel H. Nichols for Clerk of the Supreme Court and O. P. Whitcomb for State Auditor. The platform endorses the Administration of President Hayes; declares in favor of specie resumption—that the Nation is pledged to pay its debts in coin; favors the resumption of specie payment, and condemns the doctrine of an unlimited and irredeemable paper currency.

POSTMASTER FILLEY, of St. Louis, has been removed for an alleged violation of Executive Order No. 1. The statement is made that he allowed his clerks to participate too much in politics.

THE Minnesota State Prohibition Convention met at Minneapolis, on the 3d, and nominated the following ticket: State Auditor, T. G. Carter; Clerk of the Supreme Court, William Capp; First District Congressman, G. W. Ireen; Second District, J. C. Stearns; Third District, referred to the Central Committee.

ORVILLE GRANT, brother of ex-President Grant, was, on the 4th, sent to the Insane Asylum at Morristown, N. J. His mind ran on immense speculations, startling new businesses on a gigantic scale, etc. He was sent to the Asylum at the request of his friends and Dr. Morton.

THE National Greenbackers of New Hampshire met in State Convention at Manchester, on the 5th, and adopted resolutions demanding the repeal of the National-Bank act; the issue of full legal-tender money; the immediate repeal of the Resumption act; that no subsidies be granted to individuals or corporations, but the public lands be reserved for actual settlers, and that a modification be made of the iron-clad Tramp law enacted at the last session of the State Legislature. Warren G. Brown was nominated for Governor.

THE Democratic State Convention of Kansas was held at Leavenworth, on the 4th. The nominations were: For Secretary of State, L. W. Barton; Treasurer, L. C. Black; Attorney-General, J. F. Cox; Superintendent Public Instruction, O. F. McKeth; Chief-Justice Supreme Court, R. M. Rogers; Auditor, O. Shannon. The resolutions adopted declare that Congress should provide a paper currency in such volume as may be necessary for the convenient transaction of business at all times, to stimulate enterprise, etc.; favor the unconditional repeal of the Resumption act, the full remonetization of silver, and the retirement of National Bank notes, and the substitution therefor of greenbacks, to be made a legal tender for all purposes.

THE Minnesota Democrats met in State Convention at St. Paul, on the 5th. Resolutions were adopted, declaring that the investigation of frauds committed at the last Presidential election ought to have been made by the Electoral Commission; in favor of the gradual substitution of Treasury for National Bank notes, to be the sole paper currency of the country, to be a legal tender on a par with coin; against any further contraction of the currency; opposition to a tariff for protection, etc. The nominations are: For Associated Judge of the Supreme Court, Wilson Mitchell; Clerk, Dillon O'Brien; Auditor of State, Mahlon M. Black.

DENNIS KEARNEY delivered one of his characteristic speeches to a large assemblage of workingmen, in Union Square, New York City, on the evening of the 6th.

THE returns received from the Maine election (which occurred on the 9th) up to the morning of the 10th indicated the non-election of a Governor, Connor (Rep.) receiving the largest vote, but not a majority of all the votes cast. Five hundred and fifty towns give him 39,387; Smith (Dem.), 21,561, and Garcelon (Greenback), 14,955. The Republicans elected their candidates for Congress in the First, Second and Third Districts. The Fourth and Fifth Districts were in some doubt, with the chances in favor of the Greenback candidates. The Upper House of the Legislature would probably be Republican; in the Assembly the Democrats and Greenbackers would probably have a majority.

THE President reached Minneapolis from Fargo, on the evening of the 7th. Next day he visited the Fair Grounds and made a pleasant speech. He left St. Paul, on the morning of the 9th, for Madison, Wis., and at Hastings, Red Wing and other points along the route, he was formally escorted. Speeches were made by the President, Gen. Dennis and others in response.

FOREIGN.

THE Thames excursion steamer, the Princess Alice, was run down, on the evening of the 3d, just off the City of London gas works, by a Dredging Company's steamer. Then was sold in sheriff's sale.

And went to sleepers.

Full fifty years had past, and all forgotten,
When on a day, a day of cleaning house,
An old chest was moved, and in the corner,
Why not remove it from the lurking place,
And scrub behind it?

Twas done as soon as said, but on the way
It burst, it fell; and lo! a parchment,
Upon which in trembling hand was written:
"Francisco Borgia may be a very nice boy:
But not by long odds so long, so brave loved mother—Algernon H. Dauntsberry.
Who ever was a-waiting for me
With a couch and four.
At the corner of John and Market streets;
So please excuse haste and a gold pen.
Yours truly, Timothy.

A WIFE'S CONFESSION.

I did not marry for love. Very few people do, so in this respect I am neither better nor worse than my neighbors. No, I certainly did not marry for love. I believe I married Mr. Cartwright simply because he asked me.

This was how it happened. He was the Rector of Beverley, and we lived at the Manor House, which was about ten minutes' walk from the church and rectory. He had daily services at Dovecon, and I nearly always attended it, and it came to pass that Mr. Cartwright invariably walked home with me. He was a rather tall custom now, and I thought nothing of it; it pleased him, and on the whole it was rather pleasant to me.

I must confess, however, I was rather surprised when, one morning as we got to the avenue which led up to the Manor House, Mr. Cartwright asked me to be his wife.

I have never been able to find out why I said yes, but I did; perhaps I thought it a pity to throw away so much love; perhaps it was because he was so terribly in earnest that I dared not refuse him; perhaps the fascinated pale face, and his low, pleading voice would ever haunt me if I rejected his love; or, perhaps, it was because he was not bad to look at, and because he did not ask me if I loved him, for I think he guessed I did not; perhaps it was all those causes put together, but any how I said yes, and in due time we were married.

I ought to have been very happy, for he was a most devoted husband, but I was not, and though I did not notice it then, I know now that for the first six months after our marriage he was not happy either.

It was all my fault—I either would not or could not love him; I accepted all his devotion to me as a matter of course, but I made no effort to return it; and I am sure he had found out that he had made a mistake in marrying a woman who did not love him.

One morning, about six months after our marriage, he told me at breakfast that he intended leaving me alone for a few weeks, to stay with his mother, who was not very well. He watched the effect of this announcement on me, but though I was really displeased, I bottled my annoyance and asked carelessly when he was going.

He replied, the next day if I had no objection, and so it was settled.

He was more affectionate than usual that day, and I was sorry to see him over. I only once alluded to his journey, and that was to ask if I might have my sister Ethel to stay with me whilst he was gone.

The next morning I was anxious to avoid a formal parting, so I drove to the station with him. As the train moved off, I remembered he was not my first parting since our marriage, and I wished I had not been so cold.

When I got home the house looked so dreary and empty and there was no one to meet me; presently one of the servants came for the shawls, and with her Nero, Mr. Cartwright's retriever, which, when he saw I was alone, set up a howl for his master. I patted him and tried to comfort him, feeling rebuked by his grief, as he followed me, whining, into the house. Every room seemed empty, and each spoke of the absent master. At last I was determined to be busy, where he spent his mornings and liked me to sit and work; and now I remembered how often I had excused myself, saying I preferred the drawing-room, and this reflection did not add to my happiness.

There was a photograph of me standing on his writing-table, and another on the chimney-piece; on the walls hung two or three of my drawings, which he had begged of me when we were engaged; indeed, the room was full of little remembrances of me; I opened a book I had given him, and in it was his name in my handwriting, and underneath, in his own, "From my darling wife." I laid it down with a sigh, as I thought how carefully he treasured everything I had ever given him and how little care I took of all his gifts to me.

Everything I attempted, everything I looked at, reminded me of his goodness to me and of my coldness and ingratitude to him. At last I went to bed, where, after working myself into a fever of anxiety lest he should not have reached the end of his journey in safety, I at length cried myself to sleep.

The next morning I went down to breakfast with a heavy heart, for I knew I could not hear from him till the next day; it seemed so strange to breakfast alone, and Nero appeared to think so, too, for he was most unhappy sniffing round his master's chair in the most melancholy manner.

My plans, for the first time since my marriage, was empty, as I sat down to breakfast, for my husband, who was an early riser, always had a little bouquet put by my plate with every morning's letter, and I had forgotten all about it and left it to be put into water by the servant; this morning I would have treasured it more carefully if he had gathered it.

After breakfast I determined to rouse myself and go and visit some of the poor people in the village, so I filled my basket with some little delicacies for the sick and set out.

Wherever I went it was the same story, all held forth on my husband's goodness and kindness, for all had been helped by him in some way or other, and all spoke of him in unmeasured terms. As I listened with burning cheeks I felt as if I was the only person on earth who had treated him with coldness and neglect, and I was the very person whom he most loved and cherished.

As last I went home, tired and sick at heart, but there was no one to notice I was pale and worn-out, so one to get me wine or soup to revive me, no one to make me lie down and rest, as he would have done had he been there. Oh, how I missed him! What a fool I had been! Was there ever woman loved and cared for as I had been? Was there ever friend so ungrateful? Oh! why had I ever let him leave me? I am sure he would never come back. Why had he gone away?

And conscience answered, "You drove him, by your cold and proud manner, and in return you gave him nothing but cold looks and unkind words; and so he left you to seek love and sympathy from some other woman."

This thought almost maddened me. In fancy I saw her sitting in my place by his side, listening and caressing him, as I had the best right to love and caress him. I pictured her receiving tenderly the little loving acts I had rejected, and I felt jealous anger against her. I mentally accused her of estranging my husband from me, and of trying to win his love from me, though his heart was not large enough for both of us.

When Maud arrived in the afternoon, I treated her with cold politeness, as I did all mothers-in-law in general, and my own in particular, and I vented all the anger I really felt against myself on the innocent Mrs. Cartwright.

"Why, Nelly," said Maud, "I thought you liked Mrs. Cartwright so much, and although she is not here, then you can't wanted her to live with you, only your husband, very properly, as mamma says, objected."

"So I do," I answered; "but I did not know then she would ever entice my husband away from me in this way; so, of course, I should never have liked her."

"Really, Nell, you are very hard on the poor woman, for, as I understand, Mrs. Cartwright went to her of his own free will, because she was not well, and he thought his company would do her good," said Maud.

"Nonsense; I am sure he would never have left me alone, unless she had put him up to it," I replied, rather crossly.

"The truth is, Nelly, you are so much in love with your husband that you are jealous even of his mother; and you are making yourself miserable about nothing. Why, Mr. Cartwright will be back in a fortnight, and I dare say you will be glad to see him; so now, do cheer up, and let us go for a drive," said Maud.

I agreed to this plan, and giving Maud the reins, I lay back and thought of her words. Was she right after all? Was I jealous? Was I really, as Maud said, in love with my husband? Had I only found it out now I was deprived of his company? Was this the reason that I could do nothing but inwardly reproach myself for my conduct to him? And the longer I thought, the more convinced I became that Maud was right, that I was jealous and that I was in love, as she called it.

This knowledge did not make me happier, for I no sooner knew I loved him than I longed to tell him so, and make up, as far as I could, for all my former cruelty, for I could call my conduct by no milder word. I passed a sleepless night, and as I lay awake I composed various letters of confession, which I resolved to send the following day; but when morning came, my pride stepped in, and I began to feel it would be impossible to write, and I settled I must wait till my husband came home and then tell him how his absence had altered me.

I got no further, and sat and walked out to meet the postman, so anxious was I to get a letter from him; it was the first I had ever received from him since our marriage, and no girl was ever so anxious for or so pleased with her first love-letter as I was over this.

It was a long letter, full of loving messages and terms of endearment, all of which cut me to the heart, for the sounded like so many reproaches; in reality, I think there was a tone of gentle reproach throughout the letter. He gave me an account of his journey and of his mother's health, begged me to write to him a few lines every day, but he said not a word about returning.

I spent the morning in answering it, much to Maud's amusement, who, of course, thought I was pouring out volumes of love and complaints of my temporary widowhood; after tearing up about a dozen sheets of paper, I at last sent a short note, cool and with no allusions to my misery. The more I tried, the more impossible I found it to write any expression of love or penitence, though I was hungering to do so.

For a whole week I went on in this way, suffering more acutely every day, and every day receiving long, loving letters from Mr. Cartwright, and writing short, cold answers.

I lost my appetite, I could not sleep at night, and the tortures I was enduring made me look so ill that Maud became frightened, and declared that she would write and summon my husband home, and tell him I was pining away for him. I forbade her doing this so sternly that she dared not disobey me, for I was determined that he should not hear from any thing but mine that at last his heart's desire was attained, for I loved him.

At last, when he had been away ten days, I could bear it no longer, for I felt I should have brain fever if I went on in this way, so I determined to go to Melton, a largish town. Of course, as I was not expected, there was no one to meet me, so I took a fly up to Mrs. Cartwright's house, where I arrived about three o'clock.

I learned afterward that Andrew was with his mother in the dining-room when I drove up, but thinking I was only a visitor, he escaped into another room, so I found my mother-in-law alone.

By her side was some of my husband's socks which she was darning. I saw at a glance that she had given the servants to mend, and which I now longed to snatch away from his mother. His desk stood open, a letter to me which he was evidently writing on it.

The servant announced me as Mrs. Andrews, my voice faltering as I gave my name, so that Mrs. Cartwright held up her hands in astonishment when she saw who it was.

"My dear! Nelly! Has anything happened? How ill you look! What is it?" she exclaimed.

"I want my husband." I gasped, sinking on to a chair, for I thought I should have fallen. Without another word Mrs. Cartwright left the room; I feel sure now she guessed all about it, and I can never thank her enough for forbearing to worry me with questions as to what I had come for.

She came back in a few moments with a glass of wine, which she made me drink off, saying she would send him to me at once if I took it. I complied, and the next for him; in another minute I heard his step outside the door, and then he came in.

"Nelly, my love—my darling! what is it?" he cried as I rushed into his outstretched arms, and hid my face on his breast, sobbing bitterly. For some minutes I could not speak; at last I recovered myself enough to sob out:

"Oh, Andrew, my love! my dear love! can you ever forgive me? I have come to ask you, and to tell you I can't live without you." I would have said more, but his kisses stopped my mouth, and when at length he let me go there were other tears upon my cheeks beside my own.

That was the happiest hour of my life, in spite of my tears; and, before my mother-in-law rejoined us, which she discreetly avoided doing till three hours later, I had poured out all I had to tell into my husband's ears; and I had learned from him that he had left me to try what effect his absence would have on me; for he had felt for some time that my pride was the great barrier he had to overcome to win my love.

He had judged right. He was too generous to tell me how much he had suffered from my indifference, but I know it must have grieved him terribly. He is a different man now, he looks so happy, and I know he would not change places with anyone on earth. We went back to the rectory next day, but we could not persuade Mrs. Cartwright to come with us; she said we were best alone, and I think she was right.—Cassell's Magazine.

THE Vicksburg Commercial is reliably informed that in the City of Wilmington, N. C., before the war, there were a number of turpentine factories, and that during the time that these factories were in operation yellow fever was unknown. During the war, while these factories were inactive, yellow fever was a frequent visitor at Wilmington. At the close of the war these factories were again put in operation, and since that time no epidemic has ever attacked that place.

INCIDENTS AND ACCIDENTS.

—During a heavy storm in Macon County, Ga., Mr. Henry Barcelhid was struck by lightning and instantly killed, also a dog that was near him. He held an infant in his arms and the child was not hurt.

—A West Northfield (Mass.) blacksmith has a Plymouth Rock rooster, the position of whose wings is exactly the reverse of the natural order, so that when he attempts to fly he only drives himself downward. This story will do very well for an Eastern paragrapher.

—At Tiffin, Ohio, a few days ago, a twelve-year-old daughter of Andrew Robinson was tossing her infant brother in and out of a second-story window, when the little fellow jumped from her hands out of the window to the ground, falling a distance of eighteen feet, fracturing his skull, throwing him into spasms, in which he lay several hours, when death relieved his agony.

—The funniest somnambulist to date is the Herkimer County (N. Y.) lover, who rose from his bed one night recently and walked a mile in undress with a fancy in his head to call upon his lady love. She and her mother were about retiring for the night when they answered his knock. In astonishment they conducted him to a number, receiving his explanations in the morning and procuring more suitable clothing for his return trip.

—A man is now at work in Santa Barbara County, offering to clear farms of squirrels for from nine to ten cents per acre, according to size, and guarantees a thorough work. One rancher declined to pay by the acre, but would pay four cents per head for the dead squirrels. Mr. Reinhart went to work and in a short time drove up to the man's house with so many wagon-loads of squirrels that it required a check of $500 to satisfy the demands of the contract.—California Paper.

—Martin Huyner, of Brunswick, Is the proud possessor of a new pair of colts. One day last week they were pasturing on his farm, through which a ditch had recently been dug, quite a distance from the house. One of the animals fell into the ditch, in some way striking upon its back, with its feet helplessly pawing in the air, and being unable to regain its equilibrium. The other colt, discovering the predicament of its mate, began running from the house to the ditch, making more than half-a-dozen trips before Mr. Huyner's attention was specially attracted. He finally entered in lecture with the colt was neighing, when it seized hold of his coat and pulled in the direction of its mate. Mr. Huyner saw his other colt in the position mentioned, and with difficulty rescued it. Such intelligence is certainly remarkable, and worthy of the recognition we have accorded it.—Troy (N. Y.) Times.

—Mr. Andrew Keck, a citizen of Niagara County, was recently fatally injured by a bull kept on his premises. It seems that the bull having escaped from the stable to the yard, Mr. Keck, who had always taken charge of the bull, took a chain having a snap hook at the end of it and went into the yard to secure him and return him to the stable. It is supposed that Mr. Keck found the animal at an angle formed by the barn and adjoining shed, and that when he loaned forward to snap the hook in the ring in the animal's nose, the infuriated brute suddenly rushed upon his owner, catching him between the horns and pushing him up to the corner of the shed and barn where he was held until the right side of his chest was crushed in, the ribs being broken literally into fragments. Mr. Keck made one call for help, which was heard by his sons and a hired man in the barn, and, armed with forks, they rushed at once to the rescue, but the fatal work had been done. Such energy had the brute displayed that he pushed his horns through the inch plow boards of the shed and the barn, thus enabling him to throw nearly his entire weight upon his victim.—Rockport (N. Y.) Union.

OUR RADIX LETTER.

EDITOR SENTINEL:

The march of science and discovery seems in late years to be of the double-quick order, and in view of what has been accomplished, I suppose we have no right to be astonished at anything which may happen. Still one can hardly help being startled at the latest proposition of the Edison gang, which is nothing more nor less than a cool proposal to take the motive force of Niagara Falls, or any other water power, for that matter, and distribute it, by means of wires, to the factories and workshops of the country, where it is to displace the steam engine. Edison calculates that the power of Niagara is equal to all the power generated by the consumption of coal throughout the world, and he claims it to be a comparatively simple problem to turn this force into electricity and carry it over cables to any required points, and there make it operate electric engines which shall turn all the wheels and spindles in the country if necessary. Beside doing this, the same journal, according to his plan, would be used to illuminate the factories instead of oil or gas, and with a hundred-fold more intensity. Indeed it seems that this very miracle has already been wrought by a Connecticut manufacturer who thus uses a waterfall a quarter of a mile from his factory to generate electricity, which being brought to his premises, turns all his shafting and makes the place as light as day.

Another scheme lately presented for a second time to the city government savors of the same startling novelty as that of electric transmission of power. This is a plan to lay pipes all over the city which shall supply steam for heating and cooking purposes to all residences desiring to avail themselves to the privilege and dispense with ranges and furnaces. I believe there is a good prospect of a charter being granted to a company formed to carry this project into effect. The next thing will probably be a proposition from some enterprising individual to lay another set of pipes to carry lager beer and gin cocktails to the dining rooms and sleeping apartments of the wicked.

Verily the world does move. What glimpses such discoveries as these give us of the mechanical hereafter! With what pity and even contempt will our grand and great grand children look back upon the uncivilized condition of us nineteenth centuryites with our feeble and clumsy steam engines, our snail-like railroads and steamboats, and the dull darkness of burning hydro carbons for our sole illumination! Really I suppose as they look back upon us we shall seem to them more benighted than the men of the middle ages now do to us.

A sort of story book phase has been added to the Stewart will contest by the appearance on the stage of a new claimant in the person of Alexander Stewart, an illiterate Vermont farmer who suddenly appeared on the court record as plaintiff in an action against Mrs. Cornelia Stewart et. al. in a suit brought to break the will and obtain for the rural claimant such a proportion of the great property as the law might be inclined to award a full blooded first cousin. There seems to be little doubt that the former bears the alleged relationship to the deceased millionaire, but the fun of the thing is that a day or two after the suit was instituted and everything threatened a stubborn contest, down comes the horny handed son of toil from his Green Mountain farm and complains to the court that he has been made party to a suit which he is tectotally opposed to and which he never intended to bring. He reasserts his kinship, and says that had A. T. Stewart died intestate he might have come in to claim a slice; but, as his cousin made a will, that settled it and he has no notion of interfering. He therefore asks that the officious lawyers who are seeking to make a cats-paw of him may be "stepped on." It may be that these two ambitious links of the law who thought to make a nice speculation a la Dodson & Fogg, of Pickwickian fame, will wish they had not been so bold.

"Boots at the Holy Tree Inn" is vindicated. His story about the elopement of the infants has been looked upon as a touching picture of the improbable, if not impossible. But New Jersey has duplicated the case, and this time there is no fiction about it. An elopement in (about two and a half feet) high life has been nipped in the bud by the cruel parents and still more heartless informing neighbors of George Foster aged four and a half years and Ida Coyle aged half a year younger than the wonderful groom, both residents of Paterson. I neglected to say that Georgie's middle name is Washington, so when he poured the story of his passion into the ear of the Coyric) Ida, he couldn't have been a base deceiver, from the cherry tree point of view; and thus in the matter of precocious truth telling he got ahead of the original G. W. by about two years. Certain it is that Ida believed him, and hand in hand they wandered to the nearest railroad station, and affectionately occupied one seat while waiting for the cars. Whether the little stood upon the groom's shoulders and touched up money to the ticket agent with a long handled broom, does not appear.—But Georgie's heart sank to the tips of his copper-toed boots when two shadows fell across the threshold; and Cupid's victims were, not to put on too fine a point upon it, led home by the ear, to say nothing of an early meal and a painful retiring for the night. Some say it was a slipper, but that would scarcely reach the seat of the difficulty. As for Ida, well, I can best retire from the subject under cover of the usual "Tableau and curtain."

The Oldest Church in London.

The old Temple Church is, we believe, the oldest church edifice in London, the circular front of which was built in 1185 and the enlargement made in 1240. It is located in the rear of Fleet street, near Temple Bar, access to it being had through a court. It is, in fact, surrounded by courts only intended for foot-passengers. Notwithstanding its age, it is still one of the most beautiful and chaste of the churches in England. It was the chief ecclesiastical edifice of the Knights Templar in Britain, and is now the place of worship belonging to the lawyers of the Inner and Middle Temple of London. As a relic of the Order of Knights Templar, it is known to the fraternity all over the world. In the round are shaped the tombs of eight warriors who fought in the Holy Land in the time of the Crusades. It was here that the members of the "Holy Order of the Temple of Solomon," the sworn champions of the Church of Christ on earth, unfolded the banner of the red cross, and offered their swords upon the altar, to be blessed by the ministers of religion. The effigies of the grim Crusaders, in helmet and armor, are of stone, and have their legs crossed, in token that boy had assumed "the cross" and taken the vow to march in defense of Christendom. In this very spot, under the roof of this little church, during the holy days of the Crusades, the Kings of England and the haughty legates of the Pope were wont to mix with the armed bands of the Templars. Here were found in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, some of the most remarkable characters of that age. Around the altar—the curtains drawn closed and at midnight—stood fourteen military friars, while the solemn ceremonies attendant upon the admission of a novice into the holy vows of the Temple were being performed. It was the severe religious exercises, the vigils that were kept at night in this old church, together with the reputed terrors of the penitential cell connected with it, that gave rise to those strange and horrible tales of impiety and crime, of magic and sorcery, which led to the unjust and terrible execution, at the stake, of the Grand Master and some hundreds of the Knights Templar themselves, and, finally, to the suppression and annihilation of their powerful Order.—London Cor. Baltimore American.

The Curse of Fashion.

In our last issue we noticed the sad fall of the young man who was Secretary of the Pullman Car Company. There are lessons to be learned from the unfortunate event which we had not then time or space to point out. Angell, the fallen Secretary, was a man of society. He boarded at a first-class hotel, kept a servant, rode in fine equipages, gave railroad excursions, wore fashionable, and the best of clothes, and submitted in all particulars to the fastidious demands of the "best" society. A couple of years since his wife died, and the happy result of that unfortunate event was to take Angell out of society for a time; but he entered it again, and the event was duly announced in the papers. It will thus be seen that he was a society man, a man of fashion in the strictest sense of the word. That he was satisfied in his costly vices, too, has been established since his flight. It is necessary to refer to this fact in this connection, however, only to show that there was a constant and exhausting drain upon his purse, for we cannot see that society is to be held responsible for his indulgence in the vices he seemed to fing so closely.

This is the picture of the life of the man who is now a defaulter and fugitive. That his salary must have been large to support this style will naturally be supposed by those who know nothing about the matter; but his salary was not large, that is, not large in comparison with its expenditures. He was spending fully at the rate of $10,000 a year—he was receiving $3,600. The balance must necessarily come from somewhere, or this fashionable gentleman would soon suffer disgrace through the unenviable reputation of being a man who did not pay his debts. Mr. Angell could never think of lowering himself in this way—he rather preferred to become a thief. Now the sad result of this whole affair has been caused by the introduction of fashion. This young man had a passion for show; society has a passion for snow; Angell wanted to be in fashionable society, and society was eager to have such an elegant and polished gentleman as Angell. The result is known. A company robbed, a man fallen and disgraced, and the confidence of men in their fellow men terribly shaken.

And yet there are boys and young men in the country, who tire of their peaceful and pure surroundings, and have with a desire to surround themselves with the temptations that have ruined the Secretary of the Pullman Car Company. Young men, stay where you are, remaining there can be nothing but and honored there, and that the battle of life does not rage on the farm as it does among the vices of the city.—Western Rural.

They Wanted a Patent.

Several days ago an application reached the Patent Office from J. J. Strong and Asa M. Strong, of Talladego, Ala., for a patent for an ear guard. The petition, which was a very funny one, set forth that the Strongs, who are man and wife, had jointly put their minds together and had invented the most wonderful thing ever heard of—to-wit, an "ear guard"—which they wanted [illegible] against frost. They claimed that it was patentable, as it was new and useful, two things that are necessary to secure a patent. The guard consisted of drawing a chalk mark around a table or other place, by which, it was claimed, the approach of rats was stopped. Mr. Strong says, and Mrs. Strong swears it is true, that an rat cannot walk over a chalk line, and that all that is necessary to keep rats away from anything is to draw a chalk line around it. It appears that chalk makes an ant's legs slip up, as sopping a track prevents a railroad engine from starting. The petition was novel and caused considerable fun. At last the Commissioner of Patents looked over the precedents and directed his law clerk to write a decision refusing the application on the ground that there was nothing new in the invention claimed; that chalk had been used for such purposes heretofore, and winding up with the general statement that such ideas are not patentable. This decision was sent to the Strong family, but it failed to satisfy them. They had made up their minds that there were millions in their invention, and they do not intend to be cheated out of it by any such decision. As they have money they can pay lawyers. To-day there was filed an appeal from the decision of the Commissioner of Patents. This appeal will be tried, in September next, in the Circuit Court. Even if the Strongs do not obtain a patent, there will be some good come out of the application, for it will give two or three patent lawyers a job. It may turn out that the Strongs will have to pay all the expenses of the appeal, costs of court, etc., and in case they do it will be an amount sufficient to make them drop patents, especially if of no more value than ear guards. In the meantime, and until this case is decided, all who desire will have the permission of the Strongs to use chalk and make chalk lines to keep away ants.—Washington Cor. Hartford Times.

The Shadow of a Mystery.

Twenty-five years ago Miss Margaret Solomon was a belle of Baltimore. She was highly accomplished, praised, toasted and courted, and was finally won, married and carried off in triumph by an attractive foreigner who made a great display of wealth. The fine foreigner had painted to her fancy a luxurious home in South America, and a troop of connections and friends near the Imperial throne. Gold and diamonds were to be her playthings, a grand mansion embowered in exotics her dwelling-place, and a countless retinue of slaves and servants were awaiting her command. She left Baltimore with a great display, and all the wealth and fashion of the city saw her off to her South American home and wished her long life and happiness. In four or five weeks she returned to Baltimore very quietly and alone. She was weighed down with dumb woe and wanted to be hidden forever from the world. Her family received her without explanation. She spoke no word of her husband or the cause of her return. She craved a hiding-place. That was all. All that was twenty-five years ago. In the after years she never once spoke of her marriage or mentioned her husband's name. Her past was entombed in the pageant of her wedding and departure as a bride. As time went on her friends found out that she had returned home and invaded the family secrecy, but her appearance forbade them to refer to the past. So she lived on in the solitude of her own heart and thoughts. What was the blow that fell upon her young life and brilliant hopes was no one beside herself and that other one ever knew. It was a tragedy without interpreter, and to her forever unutterable. Early the other morning a woman aged fifty was found by an officer wandering about the wharf in Baltimore. She looked as if she intended suicide, and was either unwilling or unable to answer any questions put to her. She simply gave her name as Margaret Solomon. Her home was soon found. She has lately become subject to a deeper melancholy, and shows symptoms of restlessness—which render it necessary that she should be watched. That morning she rose and wandered off before the family were awake. She has always retained the respect and sympathy of her friends, and sits silent in the shadow of her mystery.—Missouri Republican.

New Fashions in Cloaks.

The first importations of the season are eagerly watched for, as they indicate the fashions for the coming winter. From these it is evident that long circular garments with simulated sleeves, and short sacque cloaks, will be equally fashionable. Most of the cloaks are black, the light colors which were used last year not having any place this season. Dragoon cloth, beaver-lined, is to be worn, and that of "moussa" cloth interwoven with silk, which forms a rough knotted surface. One cloak, a circular with long sleeve pieces, has an admirable arrangement for making the garment a walking or a carriage cloak at pleasure. The sleeves are held in place by invisible buttons, which, when unbuttoned, allow the front of the garment to be drawn forward, thus forming a cloak which may be worn for sleighing. It is trimmed with a deep band of velvet and cordelieres of silk; these cordelieres, or cords and tassels of silk, are much worn; sometimes they are festooned across the front like the cords on a military garment, sometimes they hang loose in front or at the back. All kinds of rich gimps and passementeries are much employed, in which finely-cut jet beads are profusely used; the colored bead trimmings are out of date.

Dressy cloaks are made short, about thirty-seven inches long. These have various trimmings; narrow folds of alternate silk and cloth, lapping each other, form square pockets and cuffs, and are edged with marabout or bandsome flat trimmings; grass fringes and fringes mixed with strings of fine jet are also used to finish the edges.

A new cloak is called the "Turkish," on account of a peculiar front formed by revers; this cloak also had a very graceful back cut into the figure, and finished with a narrow piece set on down the middle of the back.

A very natty and taking article is the hunting coat, a waterproof garment. It consists of a short cutaway coat, like an Englishman's shooting-jacket, and has double-breasted front with handsome buttons; no trimming is used except on a dark brown corduroy, which has velvet cuffs and collar; the grays and mouse-colored ones are plainly stitched on the edges. Ulsters are made in all the newest tweeds, and these, together with circular cloaks, will be much worn. The ulsterians have peculiar pointed capes to finish them.—N. Y. Evening Post.

Some time ago a Mr. Neff, residing near Alexandria, Huntingdon County, this State, went to his well to get a drink and found it dry. He then went down into the well to make repairs, and was much surprised to find not a pint of water and the bottom fallen out. A cool breeze blew up strong enough to rustle the leaves of a tree standing near. He tied a lantern to a rope 100 feet long and let it down, and as the lantern still burned he rightly concluded that the air was pure. He then procured a spliced rope 230 feet in length, and to the end attached a basket containing a lantern, a dog and a cat. He let them down, striking bottom at 220 feet. At the end of six hours the basket was brought up. The lantern was still burning, and the only visible effect on the dog and the cat was chilliness. The next day the owner of the well, accompanied by a trusty neighbor, Mr. Lefland, descended to the bottom. What was their surprise to find an immense cave, stretching miles and miles in every direction. Stalagmites and stalactites of magnificent gorgeousness lent beauty and variety to the otherwise no-to-like scene. Here and there a flowing stream of water rippled over pebbles of white, while thousands and thousands of bats fluttered their clammy wings, surprised at the intrusion. Petrified sea shells of a beautiful variety strewed the floors and protruded from the strata. After spending ten or twelve hours of exhilarating wandering, during which time they penetrated beneath and beyond Alexandria, and discovered a vein of nickel ore and a nugget of metal resembling antimony, they returned to the surface, where their half-stricken wives clasped them to their bosoms, thinking they had been lost. It is supposed that this cave is connected with the base of Warriot Ridge and Sinking Valley, only a few miles away. Specimens of the nickel ore have been sent to Philadelphia and analyzed, and pronounced superior to the nickel of either Lancaster or Germany, the only two places on the globe where it is now mined.—Cor. Harrisburg Patriot.

How Chafing Was Met.

At the rifle-grounds, Wimbledon, Eng., the most aristocratic range for amateur shooting, is that known as the running-deer range. Not long since, one of two or three young fellows, who were in the habit of putting up airs when an outsider shot at their favorite range, and "chaffing" him, were quickly punished.

As one of them was shooting, a very respectable-looking, middle-aged man, evidently dressed in his best, came down to the range and watched the shooting with great interest; at length, as the shooter was doing very badly, he said, quietly,

"Halloo," says the performer, "can you shoot? Do you know anything about it?"

The man civilly said he thought he did.

"Well, then," says the other, "I will stand you a gun and these five tickets, so that you may try your hand."

Then, rushing off to the other end of the butt, he said, in a loud voice, "Such a lark, Harris! I've got an old fellow who thinks he can shoot, and stood him tickets and a gun. Come and see the old fogy—looks like a butcher. Dare say he has won half a pig at Christmas at Hendon."

So down both of them came to see the man perform, and took pairs to tell all their lady friends of the fun. The man took his place, and the deer was started. He fired rapidly, before the deer had got half-way across, and hit it in the head.

Says Harris, "What a fluke! tell you what, old chap, I'll give you ten shillings every time you make a bull's-eye. If you'll give me half a crown when you hit the haunch."

The man said he did not mind doing it, and a bystander, who had noticed the shot, and had seen that he aimed at the head, quietly pointed out the part to be hit to score a bull's-eye.

The long and short of it was that out of his four shots two were bull's-eyes, and the other two close up. The man rose on speaking to his ex, and civilly thanked the two young men, who looked thoroughly sold, and were awfully put out at being so taken in, and so publicly, too.

Just as the man was leaving the range, a hearty-looking old gentleman called out, "Why, you here, James?"

The man said "Yes, my Lord; knew you had come down here, and wanted to see you shoot the game, and then thought I'd like a look at this here."

And then he told his master the story, to the old gentleman's great amusement, who then went on to the range and told the officer there, to his great amusement also, and the two young men, to their great disgust, that the supposed "butcher," out for a holiday, was his head keeper, and one of the best shots at deer in the Kingdom.

The two fellows' faces were a sight, and they have been uncommonly shy of chaffing or hazing any stranger at the range ever since.—London Society.

The Smallest Man in New York.

Persons passing through Broadway late at night may have often seen a diminutive figure, with a broom a yard taller than himself, engaged with the night gang in cleaning the street. The little sweeper's name is Julius Young, and he lives at No. 538 East Eleventh street. Next to "Tom Thumb" or "Commodore Nutt," "Little Johnny," as he is called, is perhaps the smallest man in this country. He lives in a small, dark, rear room of a big tenement house. An old woman occupies an adjoining room was asked if she knew him.

"Know Johnny!" was the reply; "Bless me! I have known Johnny for thirty year. Why, Johnny is next to Tom Thumb; you've heard tell of Tom Thumb?" The old woman went on to relate numerous anecdotes about the smallest man in New York, when in appeared in person. He came up the steps and walked briskly into the room. He is not more than three feet tall, but very broad for his size. His head and neck are out of proportion to the rest of his body, being as large as those of a full-grown man. He was reticent at first, but gradually became more communicative. He said he was fifty-six years old, and was born at Ballyhoolie, County Cavan, Ireland. There he lived until he was twenty-one years old. In the old country Johnny had a small lge and a spade made for him, which caused much surprise and joy among his parents died and his brothers and sisters came to America.

Deserted by all his relatives, Johnny felt lonesome, and when the ship which took them away returned, he went to the Captain and told him he was going back with him. The Captain, however, put him to stay in County Cavan, but his resolution was taken, and he came to New York. His small stature was a great trial to him at first. He was sensitive on the subject, and when he ventured into the streets a large crowd would follow him, and their curiosity so annoyed him that in sheer desperation he at last made his way to his friend, the Captain, and told him he wanted to go back to Ireland. The Captain soothed his wounded feelings, and told him that when once he became known persons would stop annoying him. So he went back and stolidly took up one of the attention he attracted. He has lived in New York nearly twenty-five years, and for eight years has been employed on the street-cleaning force at full pay. "I can sweep two piles to any of the gang," he said, sturdily, straightening his little shoulders. "I can't spare sometimes offer him money, but he refuses all alms. P. T. Barnum once offered him a large sum to exhibit him, but the proposal was refused.—N. Y. Tribune.

How To Secure Forfeited Railroad Lands.

WASHINGTON, Sept. 6.

A circular of instructions has been issued by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, under the recent decision of the Secretary of the Interior in the Dudyruott case, and is addressed to Registers and Receivers of the United States District Land Offices. The Commissioner's instructions apply only to lands granted by the act of July 1, 1862, as amended by the act of July 2, 1864, and the act of March 3, 1869, authorizing the transfer of a part of the grant to the Union Pacific Railway Company. The instructions say:

Where any person shall apply to file a pre-emption declaratory statement for a tract or lands not exceeding a quarter section within the limits of such grant, and where the time of withdrawal shall have been completed for more than three years, such application will be received as above, but no such claim is duly qualified as pre-emption. Therefore the declaratory statement will be suspended, will proceed and the proper note thereof made. You will immediately thereafter call upon the proper officer of the railroad company for a statement showing whether the lands applied for had been sold prior to the date of the application to file a declaratory statement thereon, if the company shall report that the land had been sold, the report must state the date of each such sale, and give a description of the tract so disposed of; and if the company shall report that the land has not been sold, you will receive the declaratory statement, and upon the approval thereof by the proper officer you will communicate with the claimant as in the case of pre-emption claims, permitting him to make proof and payment at the rate of $1.25 per acre.

Following is the list of companies whose grants are clearly under or subject to the terms of the act of July 1, 1862, with the date of completion of such roads, as appears from the records of the Department: Union Pacific Railroad, completed July 15, 1869; Kansas Pacific Railway, completed Oct 19, 1872; Union Pacific, Central Branch, completed Jan. 20, 1872; Denver Pacific Railroad, completed May 2, 1872; Sioux City & Pacific, completed March 2 1869; Central Pacific Railroad, completed July 15, 1869; Western Pacific Railroad, completed Jan. 21, 1870.

Hospitality.

One of the contributors to a late number of Sunday Afternoon discusses the ethics of hospitality in a very readable and suggestive article. Much of it is written from the standpoint of the host, and his rights are consequently insisted upon more strenuously than his duties and obligations. The guest is reminded that to abide unlimited in the house of another, or to prolong a visit beyond the time for which he was invited, or beyond a reasonable time, is a species of social robbery, and that, under some circumstances, persons who do these things "should be rated as sable brigands and treated accordingly"—that is to say they should be shot upon the spot or in the head, or suspended by their necks from trees that are old enough to bear their weight without being injured thereby. The prevalence of that spirit which is disposed to plant all hospitality upon a commercial basis, awarding to the entertained the right to be entertained, and making it the duty of the guest on one occasion to become the host on another, is gravely deprecated. Yet, while we all like that the hospitality we obtain in the hospitals of the citizens, she must not think that the pleasure of her company and the sweet and gracious condescension wherewith it is bestowed will release her from the duty of entertaining the Pogaune people in Madison Square when they come to the city, even though their clothes may be old-fashioned and their manners may want the calm repose that stamps the caste of the Vere de Vere, and their yauk and conversation may provoke the derisive smiles of the fashionable denizens of that fashionable precinct. The most generous and free-handed host in all Pogaune, whose lavish hospitality has been dispensed to the McFinneys when thought of future reciprocpense, and who would have been mortally offended by the bare mention of such a thing, would, nevertheless, think that it had entitled him to something better than the cold shoulder in Madison Square, and the rest of the world—if not the McFinneys—would agree with him.

Instead, therefore, of deprecating the application to social usages of these principles of reciprocity, there is more cause for regret in the failure of so many to observe their requirements; and, if the "social brigands" are to be summarily executed, the eternal fitness of things demands the provision of some adequate punishment for those persons who neglect the privilege—liability but repudiate its obligations.—Indianapolis Journal.

Or CHILLS and FEVER.

The proprietor of D's celebrated medicine justly claims for it a superiority over all remedies ever offered to the public for the SAFE, CERTAIN, SPEEDY and PERMANENT cure of Ague and Fever, or Chills and Fever, whether of short or long standing. He refers to the entire Western and Southern country to bear him testimony to the truth of the assertion that in no case whatever will it fail to cure if the directions are strictly followed and carried out. In a great many cases a single dose has been sufficient for a cure, and whole families have been cured by a single bottle, with a perfect restoration of the general health. It is, however, prudent, and in every case more certain to cure, if its use is continued in smaller doses for a week or two after the disease has been checked, more especially in difficult and long standing cases. Usually this medicine will require but one set of doses to keep the bowels in good order. Should the patient, however, require a cathartic medicine, after having taken three or four doses of the Tonic, a single dose of BULL'S VEGETABLE FAMILY PILLS will be sufficient.

To obtain a genuine SMITH'S TONIC SYRUP see that have DR. JOHN BULL'S private stamp on each bottle. DR. JOHN BULL only has the right to manufacture and sell the original JOHN D. SMITH'S TONIC SYRUP, of Louisville, Ky. Examine well the label on each bottle. If my private stamp is not on each bottle, do not purchase, or you will be deceived.

VEGETINE

Acts as an ALTERATIVE; that is, it increases all the natural actions of the body—the lungs, the skin, the mucous secretion, the gastric juice, the intestinal, as the case may require, and the kidneys, and in this way it purifies the blood. At the same time it exerts a controlling influence over the nervous system, curing nervous affections, and nervous headache. By its wonderful alterative action upon the blood it cures Scrofula, Scrofulous Humors, Cancer, Cancerous Humors, Erysipelas, Boils, Pimples, Blotches, Tetter, Salt Rheum, and other affections caused by an impure blood. It is the only reliable blood purifier that can be taken during the change of life. Female Complaints are speedily cured by the use of VEGETINE. It has performed REMARKABLE CURES in these complaints, and is the only medicine of which this can be truthfully said. It is pleasant to take, harmless in any quantity, and may be taken by children with perfect safety. Ask your neighbors what they think of VEGETINE, and then try it for yourself. Nothing but the best ingredients are used in its preparation, and it is offered to the public in the full confidence that it will do all that is claimed for it. I have never known it to fail in any case where it was taken according to directions, and I have never known a case to exist for which I could recommend a better remedy.

HOME, FARM AND GARDEN.

—An exchange states that if a shirt-bosom or other article has been scorched in ironing, laying it a while in the bright sunshine will take the discolored spot entirely out.

—Do not dock or clean your roots. Light is as important to human life as it is to vegetable growth. Sunshine gives as much vigor to the human system as it does to the vegetable kingdom.—Iowa State Register.

—The warmed-over beans and potatoes are not as good as the fresh, because they have lost some of the qualities that recommend them for food. Warm them the second time and they are worse yet.—N. Y. Times.

—Neither Indian corn, nor potatoes, nor squashes, nor carrots, nor cabbages, nor turnips, were known in England until the sixteenth century. As they had no tobacco either, how did they manage to live?—Chicago Journal.

—A British farmer, by the name of McKinley, has this year performed the herculean task of collecting and planting 600 varieties of potatoes, and it is thought the great assortment will afford excellent opportunity for correct much of the existing potato nomenclature.

—There is no better time than the present for draining wet ground. Swamps are now dry; work is not pressing; and the labor that is now done should be made profitable, and if the season is permitted to pass and this work is neglected, a year must elapse before the opportunity returns.—Prairie Farmer.

—As a fresh producer, one pound of eggs is equal to one pound of beef. A hen may be calculated to consume one bushel of corn yearly, and to lay twelve dozen eggs, or eighteen pounds of eggs. This is equivalent to saying that three and one-tenth pounds of corn will produce, when fed to a hen, one pound of eggs. A pound of pork on the contrary requires about five and one-tenth pounds of corn for its production. When eggs are twenty-four cents a dozen and pork ten cents a pound, we have a bushel of corn fed, producing $2.88 worth of eggs and $1.05 of pork. Judging from these facts, eggs must be economical in their production and in their eating, and especially for the laboring man in replacing meat.—Exchange.

—Cows accustomed to a great variety of food are invariably good eaters, and will generally be good milkers. Thus, the best cows in the neighborhood are usually those of poor meu, whose one cow is only a pet of, and has all sorts of food. Such cows are usually a good bargain at almost any price, though they rarely do as well when taken from their own hands and turned in with the less varied fare afforded by larger herds. Milkmen have learned that it is important to give cows a variety of food. Hence their purchases of bran, meal, roots and oil-cake. It may not pay farmers to take so much pains, but they can promote the thrift of their herds and their own profits by changing the animal's food as often as possible.—Cor. Country Gentleman.

—Water is one of the principal essentials to the calla lily, as it demands a large ambient. Moisture and air to its growth is a weekly sponging of its large leaves, which are great dust collectors. It should be set out doors in a shady place in the summer, and brought in before the frost comes. I do not think it flowers in summer, as its period for blooming is from December to May. Apropos of its summer treatment, I give an extract from a correspondent to Vick's Monthly: "Last summer I placed the pot containing a calla in a kirkin, and kept it filled with water all the time, the water being several inches above the top of the pot. It grew vigorously, in the fall I repotted it, and last winter had six of the largest and handsomest callas I ever saw. They were two plants together, and the blossoms came in pairs, hardly more than a day's difference in their appearance. The first pair were three feet six inches high, and six and one-quarter and six inches, respectively, across the top of the flower. The last pair were three feet eleven inches high, and a trifle smaller."—Cor. Western Rural.

Feeding Horses New Hay and Oats.

The question whether horses are injured by being fed on new hay and fresh oats has been made a subject of investigation by a French Military Commission, who have been experimenting upon cavalry regiments. The results of the experiments prove that the health of the horses was not essentially injured by new hay if they received the ordinary regulation ration along with other fodder. Some animals were at first rather less active and more quiet, they sweated more freely, and the excrements were somewhat softened; but in a short time this ceased. In general, the horses ate the new hay more willingly than the old. They retained the same strength and corpulence as before. The hair kept bright, the health perfect. Of 100 horses from four to thirteen years old, with which the experiments were instituted, thirty-seven gained in fatness, and eighteen in strength and endurance. Only eighteen lost flesh, and eight lost strength, while seventy-nine remained unchanged. A second series of experiments upon 150 horses gave the same results. On the other hand, another series of experiments was less successful, where seven-four horses, from four to thirteen years old, were fed exclusively with new hay, the quantity being increased until it equaled the regulation rations of old hay, straw and oats together. On this feed there was no real sickness, but a general weakness, frequent sweats, loss of appetite, digestion disturbed, diarrhœa, relaxation of the muscles, weariness, etc. The decision of the Commission was that new hay can replace old hay in the regular rations without injury, and perhaps with advantage, but that to feed them exclusively on new hay is injurious to the horses. Experiments were made upon 1,800 horses by feeding them on new oats, and were attended with favorable results, inasmuch as the animals nearly all increased in bulk and strength, from which the Commission concluded that new oats can be substituted for old ones with advantage, and hence it is useless to wait two months after the harvest before permitting the use of new oats. These experiments refute most positively the prejudice that still prevails in many places against feeding new hay and oats to horses. On the other hand, it cannot be denied that horses to which new hay is given are frequently exposed to colic. The latter is usually present, then, when the horses receive no delight rations, but have put before them as much as they can eat. In this case they not only eat much more new hay, but they also eat much more eagerly and greedily, which can be so much more injurious, as experience proves that those very losses which are most inclined to feed to eat most greedily.—Industrie Blatter.

WHEN little Thomas stoops to toy with berries, jam and jelly cake, no art can soothe the chastened boy—no nostrums ease his stomach ache. And if the griping pains defy the medicines prescribed to foil, his parents will do well to try the insipid, liquid castor oil. —Fulton Times.

It Seems Impossible

That a remedy made of such common, simple plants as Hops, Buchu, Mandrake, Dandelion etc., should make so many and such marvelous and wonderful cures as Hop Bitters do; but you see and young, rich and poor, Pastor and Doctor, all say they are the best, and are having been cured by them, you must believe and try them yourself, and doubt no longer. CHARLEVOIX, - - MICHIGAN.

General News Summary.

DOMESTIC.

A SERIOUS accident happened to an excursion train on the Grand Rapids & Indiana Railroad, on the 28th. Two coaches were thrown down an embankment near Lockwood, Mich., and thirty-five persons were injured, several seriously and three fatally. The cause of the accident was supposed to have been a broken rail.

A CENSUS has recently been taken in Washington, Ia. C., and shows a population of 12,000, of whom 40,000 are colored. There were found twenty-two colored persons over 100 years old, one being reported as old as 116. Seventy persons were between ninety and 100.

A DISPATCH from San Domingo, on the 29th, says Gen. Howard has concluded a peace with the Oregon Indians, requiring all the Indians concerned in depredations to be delivered up. He was going to Walla Walla to make similar arrangements with the Washington Indians.

AT one o'clock, on the afternoon of the 29th, three men entered the bank at Concordia, Mo., and one of them asked the cashier to change a ten-dollar bill. While he was doing so another of the men jumped over the counter, caught the cashier by the arm and placed one hand over his mouth. The men then took the money in sight, and, just going to the cashier's head, compelling him to open the safe. The robbers took all the paper money, amounting to $3,000 and $4,000 more was in the safe, but refused to take the silver, of which there was between $2,000 and $3,000. The robbers then made their escape from the town on horseback. The whole affair occupied about ten minutes.

THE standard silver dollars coined up to the 30th ult. amounted to $42,830,500, of which $1,759,184 were outstanding, leaving $40,237,316 on hand. The demand for them was said to be increasing.

DURING the week ending Aug. 31, there were 294 petitions in bankruptcy filed with the Register in Chicago. Aggregated liabilities $23,356,283; aggregated assets, $4,145,765.

THE LABOR INVESTIGATION.

ON the 27th, the Committee listened to the recital of the labor statistics of Massachusetts, by Carroll D. Wright, Superintendent of the Bureau, who also took a most hopeful view of the outlook.

C. W. ELLIOTT, formerly an importer of Boston, now a cattle-raiser of Nebraska, was before the Committee, on the 28th. He thought machinery and steam combined to produce more than men could consume. The reduced wages and left many unemployed. He believed, could suggest, no remedy.

John Resch, ship-builder, then took the stand, and regretted the chief cause of the present trouble to be extravagant habits, formed in flush times. He was satisfied we had every natural facility for building iron ships cheaper than any other country in the world. He then dwelt at length upon the advantages of using United States vessels for carrying mails, etc., thus giving employment to American seamen.

Cyrus Bussey, President of the New Orleans Chamber of Commerce, was next called. He spoke for some time on the value of the Mississippi River as one of the outlets for the products of the country, was strongly in favor of the immediate resumption of American shipbuilding there with steel and iron, and thought for that purpose the Government should give them a bonus. He believed that $8,000,000 spent in subsidies would be about the best investment the Government could make.

Otis A. Fuller, merchant, of New York City, next took the stand and asserted that one of the principal causes of the present depression was the contraction of national currency and the prohibition of legislative power. Another cause was speculative currency and unequal taxation. He thought the country could not carry more than $700,000,000 of paper currency with safety, and thought the Government ought to purchase the surplus paper money at the rate of $100 in gold for $107 in currency.

The Committee adjourned to meet next in Pittsburgh, and then in Chicago.

The Philadelphia Times of a recent date gives the following account of the travelling experiences in the South of a gentleman connected with a well-known shoe house of that city:

He left there two months ago to sell goods in Middle Tennessee and Alabama, where he had an experience on quarantined railroads which he believes he has cause to remember. Once a man gets on a train, there is no telling where he will leave it. Quarantine officers board the cars on some railroads at every station, to find if there are any passengers from New Orleans, Memphis, Grenada or other points where disease is raging. If any are found, they are hustled off indiscriminately and commanded to erect clear of the town. In his experience passengers were not allowed to get off the cars in many instances, and every arrival sometimes nearly a hundred miles beyond their destination.

"To what road were your experiences chiefly confined?" the writer asked him cursorily.

"On the Alabama Central and the Mobile & Ohio. The train on which I traveled on the 9th of July left from Mobile to Meridian or Tupelo without stopping to allow passengers to get anything to eat. It was a twenty-hours' ride. The last meal we got was at Mobile about five o'clock in the afternoon. It was twelve o'clock the next day when we reached Tupelo and took our next meal. It was a supper and breakfast rolled into one. My question was to change cars at Corinth, direct to Nashville, and I was ordered off at Columbia. It was the short and direct route, but for three days we reached Corinth we were quarantined against it, and no passengers were allowed to get off. I had to go on to Decatur, Ala., which is about as far away from one with Louisville, but away to the west. From Decatur I went to Huntsville and Stevenville, and from Nashville northwest to Louisville. This was the most circuitous route it was possible to find, but it was the only way by which I could reach my destination. Refugees were coming from the Middle Tennessee and Northern Alabama. People from Memphis and Grenada were fleeing to all points. In places where yellow fever is raging (no is found in him and farm-houses and groves in the mountains east and west of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad.

"The railroads which are quarantined so far are the Mississippi Central, the Mobile & Ohio, the Louisville & Nashville, the Memphis & Charleston, the Iron Mountain, the Alabama & Chattanooga, and the Alabama Central. The Mississippi Central is quarantined at every point. It runs north and south near the Mississippi River, and through or adjacent to all those places where yellow fever is now raging—Vicksburg, Canton, Grenada, Memphis and other points. The next great road running north is the Mobile & Ohio, the first farther east. It was this road and the Alabama Central I was on the most.

"I heard of a man from Vicksburg traveling on the Alabama Central who got off at Demopolis, a quarantine officer, from whom he was frozen, ordered him to get on the next train going. The man had no instructions to shoot any man from yellow-fever districts to the depot.

"On the train with myself on the Mobile & Ohio, to Louisville, was a gentleman from Boston, who got on at Vicksburg. He was a regular part of the season there. He had got shut up in Little Rock, Ark., and had been two weeks trying to get out of the place long enough to change cars. He spent only a few minutes at Memphis, but he had to take a circuitous land-route and finally slipping past the quarantine.

"Another passenger on this train told me of something I could not believe till I heard it verified by others, and that is that he believe it. He stated that about a week ago, a train, in which were ten or twelve persons from Memphis, had been stopped by the quarantine officers of Little Rock about four miles out, and the passengers ordered to put off in a swampy place, which no doubt was that of an old bayou. In this party was a child four months old. They remained four days there, and the whole party, including the child, appeared at the houses in the neighborhood, people could procure corn grains at them and order them to keep away. My first information of the case was from the lips of the bereaved mother, who, in her anguish, told them they must remain there six days longer, as they had promised to allow us to come into town.

"Another case I was told of was also corroborated by others. When the fever first appeared in Memphis, a young lady from Little Rock, who had some thing there, returned to her father's at little Rock. In a few days it was found that she had come from Memphis, and the authorities made her leave the town.

"Refugees have flocked to the mountain districts of Northern Alabama and Middle Tennessee in large numbers. At Bernardo, Springs, in Tennessee, where I passed a Sunday, I found about 400 from New Orleans, Memphis and other points. At Blunt Springs, in Alabama, there were between 400 and 500.

"Was there much suffering from scarcity of provisions in the towns you passed through?"

"Indeed, yes. I understood that the cities were without butter for four days. In Nashville the market declined during those days. The country people are afraid to come into the towns things which there is any trouble from the yellow-fever sections, and that is one of the reasons why railroads are in some places so strictly quarantined."

The Fever in Grenada.

The following extracts are from a letter lately received by a gentleman in New York City. The writer has lived among the scenes described since the breaking out of the fever:

"I do not know where or how to begin a description of the condition of affairs in Grenada. Twelve residences in the right and front have been fired or pulled down. Every building destroyed, the blinds closed, fast and the gates locked, and I have little doubt that in a few days more the whole town will be deserted, still standing. For hours together I climbed on a tree and watched the once happy and orderly borough. The grocery stores were closed up, and nearly all the stores engaged in that line had either fallen a victim to the scourge or had fled from town. It was a sad, sad sight to see the poor, distressed women huddled in some large, trembling, crying, wailing group, with their little children at their feet, and through the glasses in every direction, not knowing whether they'd go or stay. Mothers abandoned their children, wives fled in terror from their wives, husbands, all through the flies of kindred scenes. I have been too full for utterance. The picture of fear and despair. The doves) ones were left in strange hands. Parents and daughters were laid and the fever proved very useful in some instances, but my children were ignorant of the situation and asked exorbitant pay for their services. I saw at many of these visits nurses seized with the fever, and even with vomiting, while in the discharge of their duty. Three days ago I saw a man resting against the wooden fence at Mr. Upham's place. I was about to pass on, thinking he was only under the influence of drink, but hearing him moan, and say, 'O my God!' I approached him, and found that it was unmistakably a case of yellow fever. I assisted him to one of the seats near the police station. I do not believe that one-third of the cases of fever in its real genuine type among the negroes have been reported. I cannot omit mentioning the heroism of the Sisters of Charity. Their ministrations are tireless, as I saw the same faces around day and night."

PERSONAL AND LITERARY.

—Postmaster Tobey, of Boston, has, within six months, forwarded 4,861 unstamped letters to their destination, and shows us, and I belong to the boy, sobbing for very terror.

"O Georgie!" I cried, "don't go out. We'll be killed! Oh, what shall we do?"

But Georgie only laughed flithely, saying, "No, we won't go if you don't want to. Let's play it's a concert and the thunder's a drum. It will be over in a minute," and he began to whistle "Yankee Doodle," in which performance I vainly endeavored to join. But as time went on, and the storm became more violent, we were both frightened, and climbing to a ledge about half-way up the wall, sat silent, clinging to each other, and crying a little as the lightning flashed more and more vividly. Yet, even in his puny terror, Georgie was careful for me, and tried to cheer me and raise my heart. Dear little friend, I am grateful for it now!

At last, looking forward, I saw that the water was creeping into the cave and covering the floor with shallow, foaming waves. Then, indeed, we were frightened. What if the rising tide had covered the rocks outside? We should have to stay all night in that horrible cave. The tide usually went down before midnight, the way was low, but strong, boyish hand held mine in a firm grasp, and his clear eyes saw just when to seize the opportunity, given by a receding wave, to spring from rock to boulder.

"Georgie, shall we ever reach home?" I sighed at last, as we gained the end of a spur of rock over which the land-breeze blew, and I could hear no answer, and I turned, in surprise, to look at him. His face was very white, and his great eyes were staring into the twilight with such a fright-ened gaze that I looked about me with a sudden increase of terror. I had thought the worst of the way over, and in the gathering darkness had hardly noticed where we were going, following Georgie with perfect trust in his judgment. Now, I suddenly saw that we could proceed no further. We stood, as I have said, on a long ridge of rock, before us, as far as our very feet, was the wildly-surging water, tearing at the rocks as if in wrest them from their foundation. Beyond, we could see the strong cliffs again, but far out of reach. Behind were only the narrow rocks over which we had come; and on either side the cruel sea cut us off from all hope of gaining the land. I sank on the slippery sea-weed, in an agony of terror, sobbing out my mother's name. Georgie sat down beside me.

"Don't cry, Allie!" he said, in a trembling voice. "Please don't! We may be saved yet. Perhaps they'll come after us in a boat. Or we can stay here till morning."

"But oh! I want to go home! I want mamma. I sobbed; "and I'm so cold and tired, and my feet ache so! O Georgie, can't we go on?"

Georgie was silent for a few moments. "No," he said, at last, "we must stay here; but don't be afraid. Here, Allie, put on my coat, and I'll tie our handkerchiefs round your feet. There, lean on me, you know, or we might tumble. Now, let's both scream 'help' as loud as we can. May be, some one will hear us and come."

But though we shouted till we were hoarse, the only answering voices were those of the roaring wind and "the wild sea water."

It was quite dark now. I could see nothing as I clung there, half sitting, half lying, with my face on Georgie's shoulder. Strangely vivid were the pictures that passed before my closed eyes. I saw my pretty nursery, with the clear lamplight falling on the flowered walls and little white beds; I saw my mother seated by the fire, with the baby in her arms, and heard her low, sweet voice singing:

"Sleep, my baby,
The father watches the sheep"

I saw my father, laughing and frolicking with my little sisters, as he went was on a leisure evening. How I longed to be among them. Then my hair blowing across my eyes, blotted out the picture, and I could hear nothing but the sea drove the sweet cradle-song from my ears.

Georgie's voice stopped my weary sobbing. "Allie," he said, softly, "unmamma told me that true Knights prayed for help when they were fighting. So I shall ask God to help us now. I think He will."

Then, clear and soft, amid the roaring of the sloop, arose the childish voice repeating his evening prayer:

"Now I lay me down to sleep,
I pray the Lord my soul to keep;
If I should die before I wake,
I pray the Lord my soul to take."

I felt a little quieter when he had finished. Georgie's strong, sweet faith strengthened me unawares, and involuntary I repeated the holy prayer also. There was more silent for a long time. I was strangely weak and weary. The fear of death was gone now; I thought no more even of my mother. I think I was fast lapsing into unconsciousness when Georgie's voice half-aroused me. "Allie! Allie!" he cried. "Wake up! You are slipping down! Oh, my dear, do try to get up! You'll be drowned!" But even this failed to rouse me. I was too far into which I had fallen. I felt myself slipping from my seat. Already my feet were in the icy water, and the spray was dashing about my face. I heard Georgie call me once again, felt my hands firmly grasped in his, and then I knew nothing more.

"Allee, dear little Alice!" I opened my eyes at the words. Somebody's arms were about me; warm tears were falling on my head, and the scent of lavender was in the air. Where was I? Was this my own little bed, with its snowy curtains and soft, fresh pillows? Was Baby Robin lying beside me, stroking my cheek with his tiny hand? I was not dead, then? Where were the water and the cold sea-weed? A kiss fell on my forehead, and a voice murmured soft love-words in my ear. "Allie! my little girl! Mamma's darling!"

Then I raised my head and looked straight into my mother's own, tender eyes. "Mamma," I said, throwing my arms around her neck, "O, mamma, I was so afraid! I wanted you so!"

"But you are safe, Allie, now. Lie down again, dear. You are weak yet."

So I lay back on the soft pillow with a feeling of rest and content in my heart, such as had never been there before. I cared to ask no questions. It was enough that I was safe, with my mother beside me. Soft and early sunbeams flickering on the wall opposite. It was a long time before I thought of Georgie. When I asked for him, mamma's eyes filled with tears. "Dear Allie," she said, "Georgie saved your life. My little boy risked his own to save you."

"Mamma, O mamma!" I cried, "he said he was trying to be like Sir Georgie. And I'm like him! He saved me, and he stayed there in the dark and cold. O mamma, I love him so for it!"

"Yes, Allie," answered my mother, "not one of the old Knights was braver than ours, and not one of all the saints did better service in the sight of God than our little Saint-George last night."—Alice Maud Eddy, in St. Nicholas.

COFFEE.—A writer in the Country says he enjoyed "the gentle stimulant" in almost every coffee-growing country; and never met with it in such complete perfection as in the mountains of San Domingo, made by the natives. They take the fresh berries and parch them for a few minutes, then crush them in a mortar, and for each person put a tablespoonful of the fragrant fragments into a conical-shaped bag; the exact number of coffee cup-fulls of boiling water is measured out and poured twice through the bag. This completes the process, and the result is nectar.

THE CLOUD.

The cloud by low in the heavens,
Such a little cloud it seemed
Just lightly touching Horace's blood horses!
Where the rose-light lingered across the West,
Soft and grey as a moonlit veil,
While the gold athwart it gleamed.

It looked such a harmless shoulder,
Seen over the sleepiest wave;
Yet the keen-eyed mariner shook his head,
As slowly it crept over the dusky rel.
"See the racket lines are clear," he said,
And his lips set stern and grave.

And or ever the eye was midnight,
That cloud was lowering black;
Devouring the light of dark stars,
Dimming the flash of the lofty spray,
As the breakers roared to the northern bay
Winds howling on their track.

So, in life's radiant morning,
Man's fate, one or other,
Just trouble the peaceful course of love,
As if the strength of the waves were mine,
As if to whisper, My surface may mine,
But my rede can laugh at fate.

It may even such a little darling,
Only fourteen months,
Fen with her "ways" and learning to sharpen the glances
Be seeking "fitt in the hide" advance,
Knows how fain must smile upon circumstance
To serve the baby.

Ah, me! in the fairest tempest
The lightest is the most dire;
But we can encounter the storm-cloud,
When the heart has wrecked by Doolon's gale,
When change of death has fenced the sail,
When treason has bribed the crew?

Then wates, oh hope and gladness,
Watch for the rainbow!
Rain it sweet, brink warmth of youth,
Have it soon, bright dreams of truth,
For oh, there is neither mercy nor ruth,

All the Year Round.

MY ST. GEORGE.

It is ten years ago to-day since Georgie May and I went to "Captain Kidd's Cave" after sea-urchins. Georgie was a neighbor's child with whom I had played all my short life, and whom I loved almost as dearly as my own brother. Such a brave, bright face he had, framed in curly sunny hair where the summers had dropped gold dust as they passed him by. I can see him now as he stood, that day on the firm sand of the beach, with his brown eyes glowing and his plump hand humbly-ing a wooden sword which he himself had shaped, and painted with gorgeous figures of red and yellow.

"You see, Allie," he was saying, "this name was Saint George, and he was a Knight. And there was a great dragon with a fiery crest. And so he went at him, and killed him; and he married the Princess, and they lived happy ever after. I'd have killed him, too, if I'd been there!"

"Could you kill a dragon?" I asked, rather timidly.

"Course I could!" replied the young champion. "I'd have a splendid white horse—not a donkey, as you are—and I'd ride back the Giant Killer's, and—and—oh, and my invisible ring! I'd use him up mercy-fully quick, and then I'd cut off his head and give it to the Princess, and we'd have a feast of jelly-cake and cream candy, and then I would marry her!"

I could only gasp admiringly at this splendid vision.

"Allie," mamma said," went on Georgie, more thoughtfully, "that there are dragons now, and she said she would like to be a St. Georgie. She's going to tell some more to-night, but there's getting angry, that's a dragon, and wanting to be head of everything, that's another, and she and me are going to fight 'em. We said so."

"But how?" I asked, with wide open eyes. "I don't see any dragon when I'm angry."

"Oh, you're a girl," said Georgie, consolingly; and we ran on contentedly, wading across the shallow pools of salt water, clambering over the rocks, and and now and then stopping to pick up a bright pebble or shell. The whole scene comes vividly before me as I think of it now—the gray and brown cliffs, with their sharp crags and narrow cleft half choked up by the fine sifting sand; the wet "snappers" clinging to the rocks along the water's edge; the sea itself clear and blue in the bright sunlight, and the dancing lights where the sunbeams struck its rippling surface. A light wind blew across the bay. It stirred in Georgie's curls, and sweet about as both as if playing with us. We grew happier and happier, and when at last we saw the "Captain Kidd's Cave" just before us, we were in the wildest spirits, and almost sorry that our walk was ended.

There was plenty to be seen in the cave, however, beside the excitement of searching for the pirate's treasures, which the country people said were buried there. The high rocks met, forming a wide, arched cavern with a little ceiling in the roof, through which we could just see the clear sky. The firm floor was full of smaller stones which we used for seats, and one high crag almost hid the entrance. It was delicious to creep through the low door-way, and to sit in the cool twilight that reigned there listening to the song of the winds and waters outside, or to clamber up and down the steep sides of the cave, playing that we were castaways on a desert island. We played, also, that I was a captive Princess, and Georgie killed a score of dragons in my defence. We were deserted, too, with the little Knight's sword stuck in the sand for the clergyman. Quite tired out, at last, we went into the cave and sat on the sand-strewn floor, telling stories and talking of dragons and fairies, until a drop of rain suddenly fell through the cleft in the roof. Georgie sprang up.

"We must go home, Allie!" he cried. "What if we were to be caught in a shower?"

Just as he was speaking, a peal of thunder crashed and boomed right above us, and I clung to the boy, sobbing for very terror.

"O Georgie!" I cried, "don't go out. We'll be killed! Oh, what shall we do?"

But Georgie only laughed flithely, saying, "No, we won't go if you don't want to. Let's play it's a concert and the thunder's a drum. It will be over in a minute," and he began to whistle "Yankee Doodle," in which performance I vainly endeavored to join. But as time went on, and the storm became more violent, we were both frightened, and climbing to a ledge about half-way up the wall, sat silent, clinging to each other, and crying a little as the lightning flashed more and more vividly. Yet, even in his puny terror, Georgie was careful for me, and tried to cheer me and raise my heart. Dear little friend, I am grateful for it now!

At last looking forward, I saw that the water was creeping into the cave and covering the floor with shallow, foaming waves. Then, indeed, we were frightened. What if the rising tide had covered the rocks outside? We should have to stay all night in that horrible cave. The tide usually went down before midnight, the way was low, but strong, boyish hand held mine in a firm grasp, and his clear eyes saw just when to seize the opportunity, given by a receding wave, to spring from rock to boulder.

"Georgie, shall we ever reach home?" I sighed at last, as we gained the end of a spur of rock over which the land-breeze blew, and I could hear no answer, and I turned, in surprise, to look at him. His face was very white, and his great eyes were staring into the twilight with such a frightened gaze that I looked about me with a sudden increase of terror. I had thought the worst of the way over, and in the gathering darkness had hardly noticed where we were going, following Georgie with perfect trust in his judgment. Now, I suddenly saw that we could proceed no further. We stood, as I have said, on a long ridge of rock, before us, as far as our very feet, was the wildly-surging water, tearing at the rocks as if in wrest them from their foundation. Beyond, we could see the strong cliffs again, but far out of reach. Behind were only the narrow rocks over which we had come; and on either side the cruel sea cut us off from all hope of gaining the land. I sank on the slippery sea-weed, in an agony of terror, sobbing out my mother's name. Georgie sat down beside me.

"Don't cry, Allie!" he said, in a trembling voice. "Please don't! We may be saved yet. Perhaps they'll come after us in a boat. Or we can stay here till morning."

"But oh! I want to go home! I want mamma. I sobbed; "and I'm so cold and tired, and my feet ache so! O Georgie, can't we go on?"

Georgie was silent for a few moments. "No," he said, at last, "we must stay here; but don't be afraid. Here, Allie, put on my coat, and I'll tie our handkerchiefs round your feet. There, lean on me, you know, or we might tumble. Now, let's both scream 'help' as loud as we can. May be, some one will hear us and come."

But though we shouted till we were hoarse, the only answering voices were those of the roaring wind and "the wild sea water."

It was quite dark now. I could see nothing as I clung there, half sitting, half lying, with my face on Georgie's shoulder. Strangely vivid were the pictures that passed before my closed eyes. I saw my pretty nursery, with the clear lamplight falling on the flowered walls and little white beds; I saw my mother seated by the fire, with the baby in her arms, and heard her low, sweet voice singing:

"Sleep, my baby,

I saw my father, laughing and frolicking with my little sisters, as he went was on a leisure evening. How I longed to be among them. Then my hair blowing across my eyes, blotted out the picture, and I could hear nothing but the sea drove the sweet cradle-song from my ears.

Georgie's voice stopped my weary sobbing. "Allie," he said, softly, "unmamma told me that true Knights prayed for help when they were fighting. So I shall ask God to help us now. I think He will."

Then, clear and soft, amid the roaring of the sloop, arose the childish voice repeating his evening prayer:

"Now I lay me down to sleep,
I pray the Lord my soul to keep;
If I should die before I wake,

I felt a little quieter when he had finished. Georgie's strong, sweet faith strengthened me unawares, and involuntary I repeated the holy prayer also. There was more silent for a long time. I was strangely weak and weary. The fear of death was gone now; I thought no more even of my mother. I think I was fast lapsing into unconsciousness when Georgie's voice half-aroused me. "Allie! Allie!" he cried. "Wake up! You are slipping down! Oh, my dear, do try to get up! You'll be drowned!" But even this failed to rouse me. I was too far into which I had fallen. I felt myself slipping from my seat. Already my feet were in the icy water, and the spray was dashing about my face. I heard Georgie call me once again, felt my hands firmly grasped in his, and then I knew nothing more.

"Allee, dear little Alice!" I opened my eyes at the words. Somebody's arms were about me; warm tears were falling on my head, and the scent of lavender was in the air. Where was I? Was this my own little bed, with its snowy curtains and soft, fresh pillows? Was Baby Robin lying beside me, stroking my cheek with his tiny hand? I was not dead, then? Where were the water and the cold sea-weed? A kiss fell on my forehead, and a voice murmured soft love-words in my ear. "Allie! my little girl! Mamma's darling!"

Then I raised my head and looked straight into my mother's own, tender eyes. "Mamma," I said, throwing my arms around her neck, "O, mamma, I was so afraid! I wanted you so!"

"But you are safe, Allie, now. Lie down again, dear. You are weak yet."

So I lay back on the soft pillow with a feeling of rest and content in my heart, such as had never been there before. I cared to ask no questions. It was enough that I was safe, with my mother beside me. Soft and early sunbeams flickering on the wall opposite. It was a long time before I thought of Georgie. When I asked for him, mamma's eyes filled with tears. "Dear Allie," she said, "Georgie saved your life. My little boy risked his own to save you."

"Mamma, O mamma!" I cried, "he said he was trying to be like Sir Georgie. And I'm like him! He saved me, and he stayed there in the dark and cold. O mamma, I love him so for it!"

WHAT IS A DOLLAR?

An Unanswerable Answer to the Question.

From the Chicago Times.

The following request comes from Whitehall, Mich.: "Will you please in form a number of your readers what is a dollar, what makes it a dollar, and whether a greenback dollar is a dollar or a promissory note."

The word dollar is the name of something. First something is what the law declares it shall be. At present the law declares that that something shall be a coin of silver weighing 412½ grains and nine tenths fine, or weight of gold weighing 25.8 grains and nine tenths fine. The law provides for the manufacture of gold and silver coins of a certain weight and fineness, and calls those coins dollars. Calling them dollars is simply giving them a name. The name might be ding, or disk, or imup, or anything else as well as dollar. Calling a thing a dollar does not change its value any more than calling a sheep's tail a leg makes it a leg. The law might call a silver coin of 100 grains a dollar, but that would not make it of equal value with a silver coin of 412½ grains. The law might call a slip of paper a dollar, as our "fiat" money philosophers propose that it shall, but that would not make the slip of paper worth as much as a gold coin weighing 25.8 grains. The law can make the slip of paper as efficient as the gold coin in paying debts but it cannot make the former equal in value to the latter, or, indeed, give it any commercial value whatever. Hon. H. A. Grow put the matter very clearly in a recent speech:

"Legislation can neither make or unmake real values. Money in its real value is the creature of trade and commerce, not of Governments. Governments can fix the debt-paying value of money for its own citizens by legal tender laws, but not its value for trade and commerce. That is fixed by the dealers themselves in the commodities for which money is exchanged. And the rate of exchange is adjusted to a variation of value in the market, of either the commodities or money, based upon the cost, the demand and supply of the articles exchanged.

"The promise to deliver a thing is not the thing itself, and a thing of no intrinsic value is not the equivalent of labor, and no legislative enactment can make it such. It may be used as such temporarily, under the stress of some over ruling necessity, but, if continued any length of time, will, by the inevitable expansion and contraction that must follow, end in bankruptcy and ruin; like the evil spirits in the time of our Saviour, they only rend and destroy their possessor."

The question, what makes a thing a dollar, is already answered. It is the law. That is, the law declares to what thing the name dollar shall be given, but it does not thereby impart any real value to that thing. As Mr. Grow says, it is the cost, the demand and supply that determine the real value.

In a greenback dollar, a dollar, or a promissory note? The law answers that question. What we call greenbacks are invariably called "United States notes" in all the acts of Congress in which they are mentioned. The first act authorizing them provides for the issue of $150,000,000 of United States notes, not bearing interest, payable to the bearer at the treasury of the United States." It also provides for the conversion of these notes, "payable to bearer," into six per cent. bonds, "redeemable at the pleasure of the United states after five years and payable twenty years after date." It would be absurd to make real dollars fundable into bonds payable in real dollars.

The next act relating to greenbacks, that of July 11, 1862, provides for an additional issue of $150,000,000 "of United States notes, not bearing interest payable in bonds at the treasury of the United States." It also, like the former act, makes these notes fundable into six per cent bonds through the instrumentality of certificates of deposit, and adds: "Provided, however, that any notes issued under this act may be paid in coin, instead of being received in exchange for certificates of deposit, as above specified, at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury." From this it will be seen not only that greenbacks are promissory notes payable in coin, but that a Resumption act was passed sixteen years ago. Perhaps that is the cause of the hard times!

The joint resolution of January 17, 1862, authorized the issue "on the credit of the United States" of $500,000,000 more "United States notes * * * not bearing interest, payable to bearer on demand." The act of March 3, 1863, authorizes $50,000,000 more of the "United States notes," "payable to bearer." The Public Credit act of March 18, 1869, declares "that the faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment in coin or its equivalent of all the obligations of the United States not bearing interest, known as United States notes." In short, there is no act of Congress in which the greenbacks are referred to as anything but promissory notes of the United States, or obligations of the United States, to be either funded into 6s per cent bonds or redeemed in coin.

The courts have repeatedly decided that the greenbacks are notes to be paid in the case of Bank vs. Supervisors, reported in seven Wallace, the Supreme Court of the United States declared: "It is clear that these notes are obligations of the United States. They range on ports obligations, and every one of them leaves on its face a promise to pay a certain sum. The dollar note is a promise to pay a dollar, and the dollar intended is the coin dollar of the United States—a certain weight and fineness of gold and silver." In the opinion of the court in the legal tender cases, decided in 1871, Justice Strong says: "The legal tender acts do not, although to make paper a standard of value. We do not rest their validity upon the assertion that their emission is coinage, or any regulation of the value of money; nor do we assert that Congress may make anything which has no value money. What we do assert is, that Congress has power to enact that the Government's promises to pay money shall be, for the time being, equivalent in value to the representative of value determined by the Coinage acts, or to multiplies thereof. * * * It is then, a mistake to regard legal tender acts as either fixing a standard of value, or regulating money values, or making that money which has no intrinsic value." These decisions settle the question whether greenbacks are dollars or promises to pay dollars. They are not dollars any more than the 5-20 bonds, or any other bonds of the United States are dollars. Congress has done a good many foolish thing, but has never done anything so foolish "as to enact that a piece of paper should be a dollar, or to declare that stamping pieces of paper was the same thing as coining money. It may go to that extreme only because it has the power to say what shall be called a dollar, and what shall be tender for a dollar in paying a debt. But if it should go to this length it would soon learn that the power to call a worthless thing a dollar is something very different from the power to create value out of nothing.

Grave-Digging Beetles.

One of the wonderful provisions of Nature is the existence of certain beetles with the function of digging graves for dead rats, mice, birds and other small creatures left upon the surface of the earth, and the effluvia from which might be offensive and baleful. Beetles of this kind are known as the Necrophorus germanicus. About these remarkable animals, Mr. Gleditch, an entomologist has given us several interesting and curious particulars. Being desirous to test the strength of the grave-diggers, he provided a glass vessel half filled with moist earth, into which he put four beetles with a dead linnet. No alarm was shown by the captives. Apparently intent on the one sole object of their existence, they began immediately to inspect the bird, and then commenced the digging of a hollow underneath it, removing the earth and shovelling it away on each side. This was accomplished by leaning strongly upon their collars, bending down their head, and working with wings and feet at purpose. After laboring for nearly two hours, one of the beetles was driven away and not allowed to work again. This, Mr. Gleditch concluded, was a female, as it was smaller than the others, which continued their labor, until one by one they ceased, leaving only one beetle at his work. Ten hours more hard work were given by the remaining beetle, which at last quite exhausted on the earth and rested from his task and finally, suddenly raising himself, seized the dead bird with a extraordinary effort of strength lifted up the bird and arranged it within the spacious grave. In three days the grave was closed, and the bird safely deposited within its narrow limits.

During a space of fifty days these busy workers interred the bodies of four frogs, three small birds, two grasshoppers and one mole. This singular occupation, which continues from the middle of April until the end of December, proceeds from an instinctive desire for the preservation of their offspring, eggs deposited by the parent in the sunbeams which they inter, when hatched, produce larvæ, which, feeding on the carrion which surrounds them, grow in such full length. These in their turn change into yellow chrysalids, and lastly into beetles; and the latter, when emerged from the sepulchre, begin to dig graves and inter dead animals for the benefit of another generation.

In September, 1877, the writer had unexpectedly an opportunity of making the acquaintance of these curious insects. Two of the grave-digging beetles made their appearance in one of two under-ground kitchens, in the window of which stood a very large pot filled with mould prepared for the reception of plant-cuttings. To this pot the insects made their way, and at once began casting up the earth. On being observed, they were provided with a dead sparrow, and set to work exactly in the manner described by Mr. Gleditch, but as soon as they became tired and rested from their labors, they were ejected into the adjoining kitchen and placed close to the fire-place. The following morning discovered them again at work, having traversed to their former quarters during the night; and again they labored perseveringly till the body of the mouse gradually disappeared. At the end of the second day, it was neatly covered in, and the insects were turned out of their house and again placed in the back kitchen. Meanwhile the body of the mouse was removed, but on the following morning the two had returned to their double purpose, and were again burrowing in search of the dead mouse, throwing out mouthfuls of the mould in their untiring efforts. Finally, as a reward for their industry and perseverance, they were transferred to the garden and placed close to the dead mouse, which they at once began to bury afresh.

OPIUM and famine prevent a very rapid increase of the population of China. In a single year the Chinese importation of opium amounted to nearly $40,000,000, or about half the importations of the Empire. The people are enslaved by it, and the Government is wholly unable to control it. Once they destroyed 20,000 chests, which had been offered $11,600. They had waited too long. Opium-eating had become a National indulgence. The native cultivators now contend with the producers of India; and each year send to the weaker millions of chests. The native article is less destructive than the foreign, and in the hope that its use will lessen the evil, the Government encourages home cultivation. It is believed the home article will soon exclude the foreign. Many of the Chinese believe opium the instrument in the hands of some mysterious power to effect the destruction of their people. They say, "All the stones of the bamboos of the South, if converted into pens, could not record the evils of opium." A Chinese Society has published an appeal in which they say: "If this evil is allowed to go on, there will remain no remedy, no salvation for our country. We ask, in the name of Heaven, what unheard-of crime have we committed that we should thus be punished? Since the creation of man to our days no plague has so much ravaged our country." In the Provinces where the drug is cultivated, the people were formerly sober, thrifty and prosperous; but they have become idle, corrupt and hopeless, committing crimes for opium, dying of hunger, and in not a few instances eating even human flesh. The number of opium consumers is not known. The lower classes do not abuse use it, but the very highest, and these offer it to their guests as wine is offered in Europe. The City of Ningpo, with a population of 400,000, has 2,500 opium shops. It is estimated that throughout the Empire 600,000 opium victims die yearly. Though the use of the deadly drug does not produce the violent riots or some other intoxicants at first, it is in the end more pernicious and irremediable. Its victims become livid, their eyes lose their brightness, their cheeks wither, labor is unendurable, and all their evil instincts are unnaturally excited.

The Chinese say that only England can assist them in recovery. If recovery be possible, from this dreadful curse, and that by restraining the merchants of India from offering it for sale in their countries. Once assured that none would be allowed to be sent from India, the Imperial Government would prohibit its home production. The Chinese Government appeals to England for a restrictive policy.

Such a curse as that is now raging in the Provinces of Shansi, Chili, Honnan and Shensi, in Northern China, was never before known in any country. The four Provinces contained a population of about seventy millions, and the inhabitants are that all will be obliged to leave, or they will die of starvation. In Shansi, where is the most destitution, there were recently between three and four millions entirely dependent upon the Government for food. Here, as also in other Provinces, the people have died by millions. There is no work, no business, no money. The people have consumed everything that could be eaten—grass, wild herbs, the bark of trees, green twigs, insects, vermin, and as a last resort they have eaten dirt.

Rev. S. Wells Williams, a missionary, writes that he has seen men eating clay or stones. The stone is the same as our soft-stone pencils. It is reduced to dust and mixed with millet husks, and then baked. This stone is sold at from two to five mills a pound, and bark at from five to seven mills per pound. Grain is three or four times the usual price, and turnips and cabbages five or six times. Flour is seven, eight and nine mills an ounce.

Five millions is said to be a low estimate of the number of deaths in Shansi, and there is no prospect of an amelioration of the famine. Mothers are driven mad by the cries of their starving children, and in some cases have buried them alive to end their sufferings. Honesty is out of the question, every man being ready to lay his hands on whatever will secure food. Beggars line the road, starving and dying. Many, from eating the roots of rushes and soft-stone, die, of constipation. At the City of Ping-Yang-Foo two carts are employed in removing the dead. One person counted 270 dead on the road in three days.

A letter received in this city a few days ago from Tien-tsin says that provisions are about as scarce as they were during the winter. Chaff, weeds, roots and leaves are greedily consumed. In Shansi they not only eat the flesh of those who have died, but people have been killed to appease the cravings of hunger. Some to whom relief was given were so reduced that they had not strength to carry the food given them. Others had to be carried on the backs of friends to the place of distribution. The flesh of some was frightfully swollen and the skin cracked. In one family three had died within a few days, and the remaining six saw only death as the immediate future. In most of the houses herds of the cannot exist for famine fever, and in several instances missionaries distributing provisions have contracted the fever and died. The missionaries are doing a great good, only two of them in one district assisting twenty-four villages, 624 families, and 2,060 persons. They distribute for a hundred "cash" (about one-tenth of a cent) to adults, and three hundred to children. Up to the present time more than $150,000 have been contributed for the relief of these starving millions, the largest part of which came from England, very little from America.

The Chinese Government has been doing all it is able to do. The sufferers cannot all be reached by any human agency, for China is without railroads, and the distance of these regions from the coast where provisions can be obtained is so great that it is impossible for food in sufficient abundance to reach them. Some have found their way to the large cities, and houses of refuge have been established for their benefit.

Continual failures of crops, caused by drought, is the cause of the famine. The land has produced nothing for over three years. There is said to be scarcely a tree standing in all the region of famine, they have been gradually removed that the ground might be utilized. Very seldom has rain fallen, yet when there was a shower the people at once drew the water back to the clouds. There being no shelter for the ground or roots of trees to retain moisture in the soil. In other words, Northern China, denuded of trees, is becoming a desert, and the swarming millions of inhabitants are perishing because they have blighted the earth that sustained them. We of this country might learn a valuable lesson from the sad experience of this stricken people, and take steps to prevent the further destruction of our forests.—Cincinnati Commercial.

The Town of Nikosia in Cyprus.

THE man who, after a prolonged residence in Nikosia, can find his way through its tortuous thoroughfares to any given destination deserves a medal from the Geographical Society.

The place is a maze, and a maze without a plan; the houses are all so like each other in their patchwork dilapidation, in their balcony overhanging the folding doors, in their heaps of earth up against the walls, in their closed shuttered windows, in their dinginess; the streets are all so alike in their dogs, in their gutter running along the center, which, however, is not a sewer, but a conduit of clear water that conveys irrigation to the gardens by flocks made under the houses; in their lanes, fenzed men and sallow bright-eyed women leaning against the walls or sitting on chairs in their doorways, in the half-naked babies, in their casual heaps of rubbish, in their treacherous holes, in their smells.

The latter alone afford variety. They are either under arches, or are covered overhead with trellised vines or stretched awnings of canvas. The bazaars of Nikosia are not emporia of varied produce. You may buy vegetables "of sorts," petroleum, in wee, cotton goods which have come from Manchester unbleached and have been here printed in flaring colors that suit the Eastern taste, colored yarns, pack saddles, rugs, bubble-bubble pipes, silks of native manufacture, coarse but stout, and that is about all. If homespun fabrics are wanted it must be sent to Beyrout. There is a tailor in the place, who comes for orders, cannot show you samples because his shop is closed, and who, as a rule, is never any more back again; a shoemaker, who measures you for canvas shoes, and then returns in tatters—you that the execution of the order must be postponed till fresh material arrives from Beyrout; a tinsmith, who undertakes to make you a bath, fixes a price, and next day looks in casually and tells you that on second thoughts he prefers not to undertake the work.

Everything is languid, shiftless, slutish, unenterprising, disheartening, and everything is "kismet." You look at the musket of a Turkish soldier. He asks promptly for backsheesh. You ask your way, and the reply is "backsheesh." You look at a room which is too foul to be inhabited by a self-respecting dog, and the fellow who shows it to you and asks an unreasonable sum for rent, asks for "backsheesh" while you are using superhuman efforts to restrain yourself from kicking him. I have been asked for backsheesh by the inhabitant because I ventured to halt and look up at a Venetian inscription on the front of an old house; and yesterday a priest asked me for backsheesh because I tried to reply to his question whether His Excellency was or was not a cruel man.—*Cor. Advice to Drinking Men.

A drinking man can supply himself easily with the remedies used at nearly all the inebriate asylums and he his own physician at his own home, without the necessary expense and painfulness of visiting the Washingtonian Home or any other reformatory institution.

His laboratory need contain only a small quantity of cayenne pepper, a pot of concentrated extract of beef and a few grains of bromide of potassium. When the desire for drink recurs, make a tea from the cayenne pepper, as strong as can be taken with any degree of comfort, sweeten it with milk and sugar, and drink. This tea will supply the same place that a glass of liquor would fill; and will leave no injurious effect behind. Repeated daily, or so often as the appetite returns, it will be but a few days before the sufferer will have become disgusted with the taste of the pepper, and with the appearance of this disgust disappears the love of liquor.

The fact is proven every day. The extract of beef is to be made into beef tea, according to the directions on the pot, in quantities as may be needed for the time being, and furnishes a cheap, easily digestible and healthy nutriment. If being made "to stay on the stomach" when heavier articles of food would be rejected. The bromide of potassium is to be used carefully and only in cases of extreme nervousness, the dose being from fifteen to twenty grains, dissolved in water. This is a public exhibit of the method of treatment adopted at the inebriate asylums.

In addition thereto the drinking man should surround himself with influences which tend to make him forget the degrading associations of the bar-room and lift him upward. He should endeavor, so far as his business avocations will permit, to sleep, bathe and eat regularly, and obey the laws of health. By the adoption of this course energetically and sincerely no man who has the will to reform can fail to do so. Hundreds and thousands can attest the truth of these statements.—Boston Traveller.

A Bird's Wing.

Did you ever look at a bird's wing carefully, and try to find out from it the secret of its flight? Perhaps not; you only suppose, either that a bird flies because it is lighter than the air, like a balloon, or that it rows itself along in the air through the Water. Neither of these suppositions is true. A bird is not lighter than the air, and does not row itself along. Its feathers are not fitted for wheels to act on the wing if falls to the ground just as quickly as a squirrel. On the contrary, a bird flies by its own weight, and could not fly at all if it were not heavier than the air.

Look at the feather, and you will see that, on each side of the central shaft or quill, there is a broad, thin portion, which is called the vane. The vane on one side of the shaft is quite broad and flexible, while that on the other side is narrow and stiff; and by looking at a wing with the feathers in their places, you will find that they are placed so that they overlap a little, like the slats on a window-blind. Each broad vane runs under the narrow vane of the feather beside it, so that, when the wing is moved downward, each feather is pressed up against the next narrow vane of the one beside it, and the whole wing forms a solid sheet like a blind with the slats closed. After the downward stroke is finished and the stroke begins, the pressure is taken off from the lower surface of the wing, and begins to act on the upper surface and to press the feathers downward instead of upward. The broad vanes now have nothing to support them, and they bend down and allow the air to pass through the wing, which is now like a blind with the slats open. By these two contrivances—the shape of the vane, and the shape and arrangement of the feathers—the wing resists the air on the downward stroke, and yields to it on its down-stroke and raises the bird a little at each flap, but at each upstroke allows the air to slide off at the sides, and to pass through between the feathers, so that nothing is lost.—St. Nicholas for September.

Brigandage in Chili.

The Panama Star and Herald, of a recent date, says: "Brigandage is apparently on the increase in Chili. In the southern part of the State bands of desperadoes associate themselves together for purposes of robbery and murder. These bands are large and formidable, are thoroughly organized and under apparently intelligent leadership, and can only be resisted and overcome by organized force. The record of their crimes is startling appalling. Murders the most revolting horrity the community, and are committed with apparently no other object in the world than to destroy witnesses to the foul deeds, on the principle that dead men tell no tales. One of these bands consists of thirty men, who are under the command of a scoundrel who almost excels in ferocity Nena Sabilo. They have their headquarters near Lebu, and no passers-by, except in daylight and under peculiarly fortunate circumstances, escapes with his property and life. The rural police appear to be utterly powerless to control the evil, either from want of strength or organization, or from lack of purpose. The evil has become so serious that it calls loudly for Government interference. The bandits are of the very lowest order, mostly half-breed and domesticated Indians, naturally vicious and ironrant, who have had no crime by their own hands. Sensible men are encouraged in it through the laxity of the laws and the inefficiency of the magistracy and the police. Now that Congress is in session, Chili should see to it that this moral excrescence is promptly and effectively removed."

A strange fish broke ice from down river. Mr. Frank Billings, an old fisherman, near the upper lock on the river, while running his trout-line a few days since found in the hatchway a monster catfish. In order to make sure of his game, he wrapped the fish around his wrist. The fish, making a powerful effort for liberty, met the shaft, and the fisherman, being unable to disentangle himself from the line, was dragged under the water and drowned before assistance could reach him. Some neighbors on the bank witnessed the catastrophe, and hastened to the scene, but too late. They recovered the body of the drowned man, and then secured the fish, which weighed 250 pounds. This statement comes to us so well authenticated that we cannot doubt its truth.—Hart County (Ky.) Democrat.

Independence Among Artisans.

A number of years since a hosiery factory was started in one of our country towns, and the workmen for it imported from England and Wales; for a little while all went on well, but finally the company failed and the works were permanently closed.

When deprived of the factory work, most of these men recognizing that best work was better than idleness and bread more sustaining than any amount of grumbling, instead of becoming burdens upon the community in which they had cast their lot, set up, each of them, a hand loom or two in his little house or room, and continued the manufacture of the goods which they had produced at the factory, and by the aid of the country storekeepers disposed of them for such articles as they how they are all in independent circumstances, and can with difficulty supply the demand for their special productions.

We cite this one of many instances which have come to our knowledge to indicate what may be done by many of those artisans with us who are now out of employment.

To our mind the past years of prosperity, of high wages, and consequent demand for workmen were, generally speaking, far more hurtful to the laboring classes than the few recent years of depression and stagnation, for in the recent and present times are sown the seeds of patience, self-denial and self-reliance which will yield good fruit if properly cultivated and tended.

The chronic superabundance of the labor supply in the older countries has developed some conditions full of social suggestions to us.

Wherever we travel there we are surprised to learn that a large proportion of the smaller articles of manufacture, with which, in some instances, the trade of the world is supplied, are made by artisans in their own houses and with the simplest appliances; and we find there also, in almost every large town or city long established, business-houses whose sole business it is to receive and distribute these goods, to find markets for the handiwork of the independent workmen.

We know of prosperous firms in England who do a very extensive trade in this way on an investment probably of not more than $10,000. Samples of these articles of their productions from the various artisans so employed, they patronize, and, as "middlemen" or "commercial travelers," who travel in every direction exhibiting them and soliciting orders; on receipt of an order the special workman is notified, and soon makes his appearance with his basket or bundle of goods, which are inspected and paid for according to previous agreement. The goods are then put up in the conventional packages and shipped according to order.

Almost every variety of articles of household and building furniture, woodenware, brushes, brooms, etc., made by independent working men and women, are thus collected and disposed of by this method. Here is but a sample of the hundreds that are engaged in the same business.

Thousands of our artisans would thus make themselves and families independent of corporations and capital, and secure against the pressure of hard times.

Of course, it is not to be expected that all the articles thus produced would equal in finish those now produced by improved machinery, nor that they could be sold at such a profit as if they were manufactured on a large scale; but the independent workman would neither expect nor require such profits as are necessary to the life of a corporation with its costly buildings and machinery and its salaried officials and clerks; he always sure that any intelligent labor of his will enhance the value of whatever kind of ornamental material it is applied to, in a measure sufficient for his needs and comfort.

We would gladly advise and encourage to the utmost general independent work of this kind, we recognize the present condition of labor as a temporary one, and that the demand for workmen were, generally speaking, far more hurtful to the laboring classes than the few recent years of depression and stagnation, for in the recent and present times are sown the seeds of patience, self-denial and self-reliance which will yield good fruit if properly cultivated and tended.

A New Way of Growing Strawberries.

THERE is no doubt but that in many parts of the country the "hill" or "stool" plan is a failure because of hard winters. Fruit is much larger and finer grown by the "stool" system (that is keeping the runners clipped off), and the reasons for this are that the ground gets better cultivated, and the plants, being spread on all sides, make a luxuriant growth and bear in proportion. Now, if we can adopt some plan by which the soil can be better stirred all around the plants, we know fine fruit will be attained. Therefore we propose what we style the "matted fill system," which is as follows: Prepare the ground well, mark it three or three and one-half feet each way, and set out at least one crossing of marker set a strawberry plant (or, if you have plenty of them, two in each place will be safer and better). Keep the cultivator running both ways, and quite often, as plants commence to run freely; and by doing this, and when cleaning the hills by hand, drawing stray plants and covering with earth, a matted hill will soon be found one and a-half feet to two feet across. We have noticed that when there were vacancies in matted rows, and chimps of plants here and there, the fruit was much finer than where the matted rows of plants were continuous. Roots of strawberry plants run much farther than one would suppose, and where the ground is filled with them the finest is had so large as when they can have more room. We advise the saving of this plan by those who have plenty of land and horse-help. After they are through bearing, a small plow with a sharp knife or wheel, can be run through both ways, and hills plowed down closely, ground leveled off, and cultivator and hoe run through as before.—Fruit Recorder.

An Affectionate Goose.

Our Dumb Animals tells the pathetic story of a guardian goose, between whom and an old blind horse there was a strong affection. The incident took place on a cotton plantation in Mississippi.

One of a favorite pair of Mr. X.'s carriage horses becoming blind, he was sent to this plantation to spend the rest of his days in ease. A flock of domestic geese made a part of the stock of the place, one of which conceived a strong attachment to the blind horse.

One day while Mr. X. was seated at dinner, he observed the goose, in a distant field, violently describing circles with upraised wings and extended neck.

The horse could not be seen, and a gang of negroes was summoned to be rescue. The negroes found the blind horse lying helplessly on his back at the bottom of a gorge, and dissented to his assistance. But the goose, appreciating that their mission was one of mischief, descended also, and assailed them with violence.

At the next plowing season, the overseer of the estate, during the spring work beforehand, advised Mr. X. to use the blind horse, and his mate, and they were put into the field.

The guardian goose, insisting upon leading her blind charge, was so in the way at the end of every furrow that it was necessary to catch her, but, in turning to recross, the guide, absorbed in devotion, should be trampled to death.

The "morning" came, and the plowman, reported his embarrassment to the overseer, who had the goose put in a pen until the plowing should be finished.

A few days after, when the horses had been led to the stable for their midday meal, the goose, by a desperate effort, escaped from her confinement and rushed to the stable, where the horse had just been fed, but not, it would seem, in the accustomed stall.

She caressed, with bill and neck the fellows of the wrong horse, and was killed by an unlucky kick.

Mourners will grow weary and sigh over the baby's troubles, when Dr. Bull's Baby Syrup would relieve the child and thereby give the mother rest.

It is then frozen in the usual way. To make the best ice-cream, use the Scientific American this is necessary that the cream should be of the best quality; and the utensils in which it is made and kept absolutely clean. With every quart of the cream, mix six ounces best pulverized white sugar, a very little vanilla bean, and the white of one egg. The latter imparts a smoothness and delicacy to the cream that cannot otherwise be obtained. The prepared mixture is then to be stirred in the freezer until it is entirely congealed. Those who desire fruit-ice or ice cream should follow these directions carefully, and avoid the use of corn-starch or other thickeners. Instead of vanilla as a flavor for the cream, a trifling amount of any flavored flavoring syrup or juice may be used, as strawberry, pineapple, orange, lemon, etc.

Uneven Heels on Horse-Shoes.

The advantage or disadvantage of having calkins either on the fore or on the hind shoes, or on both, will vary in different cases. But there should be no difference, under any circumstances whatever, between the outer and inner heel of the same shoes, in point of elevation. We have seen a distinction of this kind made for the purpose of preventing brushing, or probably for some imaginary reason; but it is highly improper, because in the long run it is sure to lead to indues lameness in the leg, in consequence of the weight of the body being thrown more on one side of the joint than on the other. It is just as barbarous and injudicious to shoe a horse on this plan as it would be to oblige a man to walk in a boot with one side of the heel double the thickness of the other. However, our interposition on behalf of humanity to the contrary, the notion will likely prevail that one side of the horse's shoe must be higher than the other in order to prevent brushing (interfering or cutting); as it has to be done, it should be made in such a manner as to be at least of practical utility. We may, and can, in many cases, effectually prevent a horse from cutting by using bevelled shoes; but this is not always to be trusted. We only prevent by this the bruising of the shoe coming in contact with the standing leg, which would otherwise be wounded by it. There are many horses that would cut his if they had no shoes on them, and if we could cut half the hoof away, they would still interfere. It is the position in which the standing leg is placed by Nature, and the direction of the moving or passing leg, that produces the failing. We cannot alter Nature, we can only bring art to remedy to a certain degree the natural defect. Smiths are very apt, on being told, or seeing that a horse cuts, to shoe him "thick-heeled," as it is termed, on the inside, or to make his shoe altogether thicker on the inside than on the out. They tell you that by this mode they turn or twist the ankle further out of the way of the passing leg. This is true; but they are not aware that by removing the ankle of the standing leg—say an inch further out of the way—they bring the passing leg three inches nearer the standing one. To show the effect of this, let anyone place a bit of wood an inch thick under the inside of the heel of his shoe; if he does this by the right foot, he will find his body thrown out of equilibrium to the right. Let him, in this position, attempt to pass his left leg by the other he will find it inclined to touch the standing leg. Now let him remove the piece of wood, and place it under his right foot, on the outside of his trend; he will find, though it may bring his ankle nearer the lift leg, that leg in passing will be some inches away from it. His body is thrown out of equilibrium to the left, the left leg follows the body, and strive as he will, he will find that he cannot bring it, in passing, close to the right standing leg.—National Live Stock Journal.

A New Way of Growing Strawberries.

THERE is no doubt but that in many parts of the country the "hill" or "stool" plan is a failure because of hard winters. Fruit is much larger and finer grown by the "stool" system (that is keeping the runners clipped off), and the reasons for this are that the ground gets better cultivated, and the plants, being spread on all sides, make a luxuriant growth and bear in proportion. Now, if we can adopt some plan by which the soil can be better stirred all around the plants, we know fine fruit will be attained. Therefore we propose what we style the "matted fill system," which is as follows: Prepare the ground well, mark it three or three and one-half feet each way, and set out at least one crossing of marker set a strawberry plant (or, if you have plenty of them, two in each place will be safer and better). Keep the cultivator running both ways, and quite often, as plants commence to run freely; and by doing this, and when cleaning the hills by hand, drawing stray plants and covering with earth, a matted hill will soon be found one and a-half feet to two feet across. We have noticed that when there were vacancies in matted rows, and chimps of plants here and there, the fruit was much finer than where the matted rows of plants were continuous. Roots of strawberry plants run much farther than one would suppose, and where the ground is filled with them the finest is had so large as when they can have more room. We advise the saving of this plan by those who have plenty of land and horse-help. After they are through bearing, a small plow with a sharp knife or wheel, can be run through both ways, and hills plowed down closely, ground leveled off, and cultivator and hoe run through as before.—Fruit Recorder.

An Affectionate Goose.

Our Dumb Animals tells the pathetic story of a guardian goose, between whom and an old blind horse there was a strong affection. The incident took place on a cotton plantation in Mississippi.

One of a favorite pair of Mr. X.'s carriage horses becoming blind, he was sent to this plantation to spend the rest of his days in ease. A flock of domestic geese made a part of the stock of the place, one of which conceived a strong attachment to the blind horse.

One day while Mr. X. was seated at dinner, he observed the goose, in a distant field, violently describing circles with upraised wings and extended neck.

The horse could not be seen, and a gang of negroes was summoned to be rescue. The negroes found the blind horse lying helplessly on his back at the bottom of a gorge, and dissented to his assistance. But the goose, appreciating that their mission was one of mischief, descended also, and assailed them with violence.

At the next plowing season, the overseer of the estate, during the spring work beforehand, advised Mr. X. to use the blind horse, and his mate, and they were put into the field.

The guardian goose, insisting upon leading her blind charge, was so in the way at the end of every furrow that it was necessary to catch her, but, in turning to recross, the guide, absorbed in devotion, should be trampled to death.

The "morning" came, and the plowman, reported his embarrassment to the overseer, who had the goose put in a pen until the plowing should be finished.

A few days after, when the horses had been led to the stable for their midday meal, the goose, by a desperate effort, escaped from her confinement and rushed to the stable, where the horse had just been fed, but not, it would seem, in the accustomed stall.

She caressed, with bill and neck the fellows of the wrong horse, and was killed by an unlucky kick.

Mourners will grow weary and sigh over the baby's troubles, when Dr. Bull's Baby Syrup would relieve the child and thereby give the mother rest.

WILLARD A. SMITH, Editor and Proprietor.

General News Summary.

DOMESTIC.

It was reported, on the 10th, that the currency balance in the United States Treasury was $11,380,000, including the $1C,- 000,000 for the redemption of fractional currency, and $236,985,000 in coin, including about $10,000,000 in standard silver dollars. Of the $10,000,000 of fractional currency issued in 1862, over $4,00o,000 were still outstanding. Of the three and five-cent pieces issued in 1863, probably over $2,000,000 were outstanding. The entire amount of fractional currency outstanding was $16,351,092.

THE report, received at St. Paul, on the 11th, that Gen. Miles had been surrounded and captured by a body of Bannock Indians, turns out to have been unfounded, the facts being exactly the reverse. On the 4th, he, with twenty-seven men and thirty-five friendly Crow Indians, surprised and attacked the Bannock hostiles in the pass by the National Park, Wy. T., and after a desperate fight, of about two hours' duration, captured thirty-four Bannock squaws, women and children, and about 200 head of horses. Eight Bannocks, a French scout, and one Crow Indian were killed on the side of the troops, and thirteen Bannock Indians were slain. Not more than three or four Bannock warriors escaped.

A CIRCULAR was issued from the United States Treasury Department, on the 13th, instructing the disbursing officers to issue orders directing the exchange of standard silver dollars for United States notes. The reason assigned was that the Secretary had been advised that such exchange was a substantial resumption of specie payments, and that he had no authority to anticipate the period fixed by law for such resumption. The further announcement was made that silver dollars would be paid out for coin obligations and for common currency demands upon the Treasury.

A SEVERE storm swept over Ohio, Pennsylvania, New York and other Eastern States, beginning on the 9th and reaching its climax on the night of the 12th. Very many of the bridges on the trunk lines were swept away, and other lines were less by the city of Meadville, Pa., the storm was particularly violent, and great damage was done. About three miles of the railroad was washed into a culvert which had washed out, and six persons were drowned. The Welland Canal was choked completely, and vessels could not pass from Lake Erie to Lake Ontario for some weeks.

OUR RADIX LETTER.

New York, Oct. 4, 1878.

EDITOR SENTINEL.

There is nothing, thinks Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, the champion theological summersault and trapeze performer of Brooklyn, like posting one's self thoroughly on subjects upon which one is to be called upon to speak. Especially is it indispensable, in his estimation, for a minister of the gospel to know the ways of sin from A to Izzard, to follow Satan boldly into his visible as well as his invisible strongholds; in short, to tackle Old Nick upon his own dunghill. Full of these great truths the impassioned exhorter lately secured the co-operation of two non-clerical friends and the convoy of a policeman (probably as a guarantee to the scoffing world that his intentions were honorable) and thereupon made a night of it among the most disreputable gin-mills and dance houses of New York city. It is to be presumed that the parson "saw the elephant" trunk, tusks and tail, for he has since expressed himself to several newspaper reporters as being chock full of holy horror and burning with impatience to preach a sermon to young men which shall spread terror and destruction among the cohorts of the enemy.

Now all this desire to do good to his flock is highly commendable, but it seems seriously questionable whether the old maxim to the effect that the end justifies the means, can safely be subjected to such a strain as Mr. Talmage brings upon it. An old New Yorker like himself can certainly learn enough about such places for preaching purposes without putting the indignity upon his office of being seen in such company. His example is unfortunately likely to have more effect upon young men than his precepts; for they will be very apt to argue that if it is right for a minister to visit such resorts to inform himself about their doings, it certainly cannot be wrong for them to follow in his footsteps for the same purpose. Mr. Talmage undoubtedly Means well, but his tendencies toward sensationalism and his craving for notoriety sometimes involve him in violations both of good morals and good taste.

For ways that are dark and tricks that are vain the heathen Chinee isn't a circumstance to the average city tramp. Given good health and an early start, and the professional beggar will cover more ground in ingenious statement—otherwise lies—in a day than the celestial before mentioned could accumulate during an industrious week. There is always a refreshing change in the daily talk of the penniless man. He greets you in your office one morning with his arm slung up and a patch of unearthly size on his cheek. He had a fall from the top of a nine story building, while honorably employed at his legitimate trade—bricklaying. He pictures his seven small children at home in different stages of all known diseases, which his wife and youngest are unable to secure nourishment.

You mildly suggest a suspicion of bad whiskey in his breath and he indignantly points to the bandage on his cheek as being the lurking place of the pungent odor—a medical preparation. So week is his manner and so unanswerable his argument, that you divide with him your small store of pennies. But the next day you feel an uncomfortable small-ness creeping over you when this same man of reckless statement with both arms free and with smiles upon two unclouded cheeks, stands upon a corner and holds out a pleading hand. To-day he is immovible, as a glance at his bandaged legs shows, and his story includes a motherless home and a startling increase in the number of juvenile dependants. Still again, the next day, he is fresh from the hospital with the same odor of medical (?) preparation clinging to every fold of his ventilated garments. And so this protean individual wanders through the complaining of the "cheap labor" of the Chinese bottom will satisfied with clemonymary existence to lift his finger to an honest hour's toil.

The park is his bed room and the drinking fountain his bath and laundry. During the summer his wants are easily met, but when he is driven to cover by frost he often drifts into court and is supplied with food and lodging for the winter at government expense. But the edge is taken off our sympathy when we learn that it is an open question whether or not the petty larceny which secured these free luxuries, was not committed for this very end. Truly the heathen Chinee must wake up.

The forty seventh annual exhibition of the American Institute is now open and shows an unusually large proportion of artistic work in all departments.

In the early history of this country the people separated by months of time from Europe, were dependant upon themselves for many things, and their tastes were comparatively simple. As we became rich, wealth sought an outlet in display, and then came what might be called the barbaric stage of taste. We hung ponderous watchchains to our vests, lighted up our shirt fronts with diamonds in broad day light and our fair sex swept our streets with costly silks and satins such as are not worn in other countries save at evening in the reception room. As for the decoration of our houses the barbaric age showed equal invention. Our drawing rooms blazed with gilding, and who can recall without a shudder the hideous mantel and other ornaments, called by courtesy objects of art, and charitably credited with a Parisian origin, which were at once the pride and delight of their possessors. Of late years the American took to travelling, he saw what was good in the old world, and the result is another revolution in popular taste.

RADIX.

An Astonishing Fact.

A large proportion of the American people are to day dying from the effects of Dyspepsia or disordered liver. The result of these diseases upon the masses of intelligent and valuable people is most alarming, making life actually a burden instead of a pleasant existence of enjoyment and usefulness as it ought to be. There is no good reason for this. If you will only throw aside prejudice and skepticism, take the advice of your Druggist, Geo. W. Cheever, and your friends, and try one bottle of Green's August Flower. Your speedy relief is certain. Millions of bottles of this medicine have been given away to try its virtues, with satisfactory results in every case. You can buy a Sample Bottle for 10 cents to try. Three doses will relieve the worst case. Positively sold by all Druggists on the Western Continent.

By No Means a Laughing Matter—The Yellow-Fever Horror in Memphis.

Memphis people are not as Boston laugh at the reports of the panic which the Associated Press has sent North. Has any thing as serious nearly so been?

The above, from a Boston paper, was sent to one of the telegraph operators employed here by the Western Union Telegraph Company, and by Mr. Carron, the local agent of the Western Associated Press, to whom he gave it, was handed to us. We would give words had we them to give, to know the names of the Memphians, who, absenting themselves from their homes from fear of the fever, mock at the pangs and sufferings of 3,000 sick, laugh over the twelve hundred dead men, women and children who sleep in Elmwood and Calvary Cemeteries, and Potter's field, and deride the needy widows and orphans, and hungry, unemployed laborers, who clamor for the food doled out to them day by day, the charity, not of Memphis people, who enjoy Boston and laugh over the press reports, but, thank God! of millions who never met any Memphians, but who are moved by the plain, simple, unvarnished statements of Mr. Catron, who, to our knowledge, has always been under rather than over the mark. Memphis people visiting Boston may laugh, but we, who are here, are daily, hourly, in tears for the manly men and saintly women, many of whom might have been with us otherwise—to share the fate of their himbler fellow-citizens, and have fallen in the cause of humanity. But there must be some mistake about it. Surely there is not one of all the thousands of Memphians who are safe from the pestilent that takes hundreds per day or more, who would laugh over the reports, even though they were exaggerated, which they are not. Surely there is not one so lost to shame, to the commonest decency, as to laugh while all the world is serious over our sorrow, and the open hand of charity ministers to our wants from all parts of the earth. To lose over 1,200 men, women and children in twenty-seven days, out of a population of 15,000, white and black, and to be expending or $10,000 for 1,200 horses and forty doctors, and for medicines and food for more than 3,000 sick and 10,000 indigent, is to us a sad reality, enough to move even a stone to tears. But, beside this, there come the tales of individual sorrow, of whole families swept away as in a week, leaving not even one of the name of nurses dying at their posts, of priests and ministers, and good sisters following those they succored so fast as to equal the stoutest heart, and "give us pause" amid the general wreck and ruin. No pen can do these scenes and sights justice; no tongue exaggerate them. Leaping childhood, honey and vanerable age, the vengeant and the merchant, the man of God and the unbeliever, all are taken, all cushed alike by the awful pestilence. It thins all ranks, and brings despair of any relief, but we are nerved for the end. We pray blessings upon the generous who have helped us in all the States; we pray for the safety of those who have come among us to nurse the sick and minister to the dying, and we ask that the names of the women and the men who have laid down their lives for us shall be handed down forever as among the brightest and the best of earth.—Memphis Appeal.

Sir John Lubbock on Ants.

"Sir John Lubbock said that he had been for some years watching the habits of ants and had kept under observation about thirty species. Though living in captivity they were in good health, and he had in one nest a queen which had lived with him since 1874. He could confirm the statements which had been made with respect to the architectural skill of ants, their attention to their young, their remarkable organization, their possession of domestic animals, and even the institution of slavery. He had also watched several other insects which lived in association with them, of which M. Andre calculated that there were 583 species. In some cases the association was accidental; in others it was because the nests afforded shelter to other insects, and there were also some uncomfortable companions which attached themselves to ants and could not be got rid of.

"The common house ant was to be found sometimes in association with other ants, but the cases were exceptional, and he had never seen any instance. A nearly allied species, however, the sanguinea, was sometimes found in association with others, generally the fusca. In such cases the nest belonged to the sanguinea. The queen and the young were of that species, and the fuscas were slaves, though free to come and go, as there was no fugitive slave law, and they seemed to be quite reconciled to their position. They assisted in the household duties, and in foraging for provisions. They kept the aphides in corn, and derived a considerable share of their sustenance from them. In the winter, when they were of no use, they were still tended with great care, until the spring, when they became again useful—an instance of prudence and forethought unexampled in the animal kingdom. There was one case in which a nest had remained for two winters without any fusca, though they tried to stretch up to the honey, and then went round by the bridge. He made a similar experiment by placing honey which could only be reached by crossing a steamy river which he had had, as a prize, a tuft of straw. He slightly moved the bridge, and they tried in vain to stretch over, but never thought of putting the straw back, which they could easily have done. Every one knew that if an ant or bee found a store of honey, others would soon collect about it; but very little intelligence was employed if the ants and bees only accompanied their friends. The case was different if they could describe the locality and send their friends to it. They did not, however, appear to be able to communicate as much as that to their friends. If a fusca's nest was disturbed and one of them found a piece of cocoanut, she was anxious that her friends should come to it. She went up to one of them and took it by the mandible. The second ant rolled herself up in a ball and was carried over her shoulder to the place. The second ant then went to a third and the process was repeated.

"He put an ant which had been without food for some days to money, and saw that after feeding she was on her way to the nest when she met some friends, whom she fed, and then returned alone to the money. On her way back she met some other friends, whom she fed, and then five of them went back with her to the honey. In due course they, no doubt, brought others. He believed they were able to distinguish between a large and a small quantity. To use this he put some of the Lucinus Niger species into a small store and others into a large one, and, having watched for fifty hours found that the ants with the small quantity brought eighty-two friends to share it, and the ants with the large store brought two hundred and fifty-seven. To try whether they could send their friends to a store, he put an ant (Niger) to some honey, which he placed near her nest. She fed, returned to the nest, and came out with ten friends. He took her up, however, and put her into the honey, and her friends then wandered about and then returned to the nest."

THERE are two kinds of things at which a man should never get angry—what a man cannot help and what he can.

Mamma's Grave.

A boy, not over eleven years old, whose pinched face betrayed hunger, and whose clothing could scarcely be called by the name, dropped into a carpenter shop on Grand River avenue the other day, and after much hesitation explained to the foreman:

"We want to get a grave-board for ma. She died last winter, and the graves are so thick that we can't hardly find hers no more. We went up last Sunday, and we come awful near not finding it. We thought we'd git a grave-board, so we wouldn't lose the grave. When we thought we'd lost it clean we cried, and Bud she cried, and my chin trembled so I could hardly talk!"

"Where is your father?" asked the carpenter.

"Oh, he's home, but he never goes up there with us, and we shan't tell him about the board. I guess he hated ma, for he wasn't home when she died, and he wouldn't lay no collin nor nothing. Sometimes, when we are sittin' on the doorstep talkin' about her, and Jack and Bud are cryin', and I'm remembrin', how she kissed us all afore she died, he says we'd better quit that or we'll get what's bad for us. But we sleep up stairs, and we talk and cry in bed when we all want to. How much will the board be?"

The carpenter selected something fit for the purpose, and asked:

"We'll take it up on our cart," replied the boy, "and I guess the graveyard man will help us put it up."

"You want the name painted on, don't you?"

"Yes, sir, we want the board white, and then we want you to paint on that that she was our ma, and that she was forty-one years old, and that she died the second of November, and that she's gone to Heaven, and that she was one of the best mothers ever was, and that we are going to be good all our lives and go up where she is when we die. How much will it all cost, sir?"

"How much have you got?"

"Why!" said the boy, as he brought out a little calico bag and emptied its contents on the bench, "Bud drawed the baby for the woman next door and earned twenty cents, Jim weeded in the garden and earned forty cents, and he found five more in the road; I run errands and made kites and fixed a boy's cart and helped carry some apples into a store, and I earned sixty-five cents. All that makes a hundred and thirty cents, and we don't owe a cent we've got it, 'cause we kept it hid in the ground, under a stone."

The carpenter meant to be liberal, but he said:

"A grave-board will cost at least three dollars."

The lad looked from his little store of metals to the carpenter and back, realized how many weary weeks had passed over the nest, and how much was saved, and suddenly wailed out:

"Then we can't have it, for only one, and mother's grave will get lost."

But he left the shop with tears of gladness in his eyes, and when he reflected, yesterday, little Bud and Jack were with him, and they had a cart. There was not only a head-board, but a foot-board, and the grave was neatly and painter and carpenter had done their work with full hearts and done it well.

"Ain't it awful nice—nicer than rich folks have?" whispered the children, as the boards were being placed on the cart. "won't the grass look nice, though, and won't ma be awful glad!"

Ere this the mother's grave has been found, and, last night comes the three motherless ones will cuddle close together and whisper their gratitude that it cannot be lost to them even in the storms and drifts of winter.—Detroit Free Press.

Fall Fashions.

The earliest importations of fall wraps feature sacques or coats for plain garments for general wear, and mantles for dressy wraps. The new loosely-woven dress-cloths called coatings, containing several colors blended together, will be made into cut-away coats for early fall weather, and very simply trimmed with passementerie and dark silk. Such will be chosen for mantles: black, steel gray and dark blue will be the colors used. The trimmings will be passementeries as fluffy as feathers, yet made of silk and sometimes brightened by beads or ornamented with tiny pendant drops, balls and buttons. These will form the bearings for plaited laces and for the new Bambean fringe of crinoid lamé twisted in spiral shapes like so many small corkscrews.

Merchants differ about the use of beads. They all think the jet will be worn again, but more carefully than of late, but they differ about retaining the rainbow and garnet beads. Very handsome inlaid buttons are being imported in colors to match costumes. Very small jet buttons will be sold by the gross for trimming a single dress of black silk or of wool.

Heavy square shawls for early fall use have the smooth center of black, brown or gray, with a broad bourette or other rough-figured border in which appear the gay colors of India cashmeres. Others are all of one color, and are finished with handsomely plaited fringe, and on some the deep fringe is in bright Scotch plaid colors. The reversible shawls, different on each side, are very thick and warm. Striped shawls have richly shaded borders. The traveling shawls, long, fine and soft, are in clan tartans, and are most liked in combinations of green and blue.

Interesting Shaded Persian combs and designs are brought out in the new bracelet silks for fall. The colors are very rich and dark for the background, and are brilliantly lighted with gold tints of yellow blue and rose. Grenat, which is very dark garnet, is the favorite color for the ground, and in almost every piece shown there are tufts, threads, and sometimes leaves of the palest shades of blue; there is also a great deal of bronze shading, of old gold, and of prune color. These fabrics are to make stately dresses for dinner parties and for the house.

For wedding dresses are white velvet brocades on satin grounds of the richest qualities. The velvet flowers are of deep mossy fur, and suggest white moss-roses. For evening dresses is white satin brocaded with a small figure in colors, such as pink roses, cream-colored catfish plumes, or pale blue palm leaves.

Silks for lower skirts of brocaded costumes have inch-wide satin cross stripes of self-color, or else of shaded tints to match the grounds of the brocades.

The plaids most largely imported for ladies' dress skirts and dresses are of dark grave colors, arranged in what merchants call fancy plaids—meaning that they belong to no special clan. These will probably be most popular here, but Parisiennes have a caprice this season for wearing the various Scotch clan tartans that Worth has been making all summer for Exposition dresses. In these tartans every line, bar and color follows a design that has been in use for generations, and which is never varied. The tartans that are most used in Paris are the Forty-second, with its green and yellow and brown, the Argyll plaid, the gay Mackenzie tartan, with lines of red and yellow mixed with blue and green, the Forbes, the Malcolm and the Macleod. In the plaited walsts and kilt skirts of short dress these plaids are disposed in most effective ways; sometimes a certain bright part of each plaid is brought out on top of each kilt plait, or a single broad square forms the yoke, the cuffs or the pocket of the dress. The only trimmings are buttons and pipings. That gilt button the color of pale Scotch Etruscan gold, and engraved like pure gold, are used on plaid dresses. The belts are wide—indeed, rather too wide to be becoming to the figure—and are fastened by square gilt buckles.

The merchants who have returned from Paris are in possession of novelties for at least; they all speak with enthusiasm of the short walking-dress, and of the graceful designs in which it will be brought out this fall. The round skirt is by no means to be confined to the plaited kilt, which will be most used for plaids; this skirt is heavy when made of winter goods, and consequently many ladies will use instead the round gored skirt, short enough to clear the ground. For the waist double-breasted coats will be worn, fastened by four rows of buttons, and cut away at the top and below the waist line to show a vest of different material, the latter being generally of materials that are designed especially for vests, such as corduroys, quaint small-figured brocades and some of Oriental stripes. For the house, dress skirts will be longer and wider, with the fullest forming panlers and bouffant effects. Conservative ladies will be sorry to give up the graceful princesse dresses, hence they will be more abundantly trimmed with drapery in the way of panels and aprons to give them an appearance of fullness. Polonaises of new designs are shown, and there are basques with over-skirts, and others with a single skirt trimmed to simulate an over-skirt. Two materials will be used again in rich combinations, and the consummate reader will be glad to know that most of the dresses of last season can be remodeled easily and without expense.—Harper's Bazar.

A Prairie Duel.

Some five years ago Adam Goldie left his native County of Shannon, Mo., where he is engaged in cattle raising, for Northern Texas, where he passed two years, and there one of the most exciting incidents of his career happened. Texas as a markssman among the Texans soon became noticed in the vicinity of Goldie's ranche lived William Darrell, or, as he was more familiarly termed, Texas Bill. Bill was already still as a noted outlaw and desperado. His feats in marksmanship were likewise astounding, and probably no man in the Lone Star State excelled him in handling the rifle. He became jealous of Goldie's fame, and managed to pick a quarrel with him, which resulted in a challenge. After a short consultation they decided that a duel should be fought, but in consequence of the extraordinary skill of the parties, at a long distance.

On the open prairie, about two miles distant, grew two post-oak trees. They were 420 yards apart, and were the only trees on that spot. All around was open, flatberless prairie. It was decided that Goldie and Bill should both take their rifles and each take up a position behind their respective trees, and then blaze away at each other. The Texans hoped by this means to prevent bloodshed, or at least to prevent a fatal termination of the affair. The preliminaries being settled, the whole party mounted their horses and rode out on the prairie to the selected spot. Goldie took up his position behind one of the trees, and Bill ensconced himself behind the other. The remaining parts of the crowd then rode to a slight undulating eminence to the right, where they were to remain as spectators. One of them was to give the signal for the beginning of the combat by firing his rifle in the air, and the report was to be the signal for the duelists to begin with their bloody work. Intense would unanimity the detonation of the rifle, which suddenly sounded on the air.

Then began the duel at the longest range ever recorded. Goldie advanced from behind the tree in a kneeling posture, when, whiz! his sombrero was perforated by a ball from Bloody Bill's rifle. Quick as lightning he dropped full length on the ground in time to escape the two other bullets which came in rapid succession. He lay still, brought his rifle into position, as he was stretched upon the ground, and then remained immovable. Presently he saw a diminutive figure which he knew to be Bill (who was nearly one inch taller than Goldie) advancing cautiously from the shelter of the tree. Quickly taking aim he fired twice in succession and then retired behind the sheltering trunk. One of the bullets, he afterward discovered, had passed through the lobaco Bill's leftcoat. There was a cessation now of firing for some time, when Goldie espied his opponent's head and shoulders exposed. Quick as lightning he drew a bead on his shoulder, and the detonating report was heard. Bloody Bill's hat was carried away by the bullet. Goldie now rather incautiously advanced from his shelter and became the target for six balls in rotation, one of which made a hole in his coat-sleeve, and another through his pants. He beat a hasty retreat.

The duelists remained gazing at the distant trees, each watching for the inadvertent movement which would be necessary. Each peered cautiously from behind the tree, endeavoring to get sight of each other's person, when he saw Bill again advance, and the former stepped rapidly to the front and quickly brought his rifle into position. Almost simultaneous were the crack, sharp report of two rifles rang on the air, and both men fell. Goldie managed to raise himself and crawl behind the trunk of the tree. He had been wounded in the left shoulder. Presently he was joined by the Texans, who had been witnesses of this most exciting duel. They had already ridden over to Bloody Bill and found him dead. A rifle ball penetrated his temple.—St. Louis Post.

Something About Tin.

Tin is a short word, but replete with meaning. Every grocery fellow's pockets are empty (and there are thousands of impoverished bankrupts but now) because of tin. Every "tin" of Mr. and Mrs. Smith celebrate their tenth wedding anniversary, it is called a tin wedding. Then, what a gathering of friends and with a present of tinware, some of them very odd and useless, but mostly articles of utility; so that the Smith family find themselves in a long season of tinware enough to last them through life, and they may well be proud and happy.

Tinware is a big institution. There are in Chicago no less than twenty large tinware factories, employing 1,500 hands. West with kitchen ware—one of them even exports certain lines of tin goods to Europe, from whence the tin comes—and giving occupation to many hundreds of hands.

Tin is also a mistake; the ware called "tin" is only a wash of tin over sheet iron. As well might we speak of plated ware as being silver. We recently saw a cleverly-made article in white looking in at a metal store on Lake street and listening to the conversation. We learned that, while our extensive country produces nearly all metals, from gold to lead, there has never yet been discovered a tin mine. Should one be found, many would be in there to see," and take a few shares in it.

Tin is used for various purposes other than for "Britannia ware." The fine black cloths we get from France are colored by a solution of tin. The most beautiful red colors in carpets are made by a chemical process which requires pure tin in the composition. The best and most reliable tin is imported from the Dutch East India Island of Banca. It is taken from Banca in lumps, and there sold, by auction, at semi-annual sales—and from there finds its way to all parts of the civilized world.

Tin, in quality is Malacca or Straits tin, so named because it reaches us through the Straits of Malacca. A small quantity comes from China, but the Celestials have so many ways of cheating that their tin is very unpopular. Our English neighbors send us great quantities of their Cornwall tin, and they pronounce it superior to all others, but while it is pure, it is not so soft as Banca, and Western Australian prefers the latter. From South America we receive small supplies; but its quality is inferior and very dressy. One imports of tin and tin plates during the last fiscal year amounted to $12,112,-593, while in 1873 they were $18,496,-653.—Chicago Commercial Advertiser.

Of course, others beside ourselves have noticed that fruit will not always grow much larger in the West than they do in the North. Especially hailstones. Probably it is because they grow more healthy and robust there in the West. When an old farmer enters a printing office to give the particulars of a destructive storm, and gets the hail-stones any smaller than hulled walnuts, the "press gang" kill him on the spot and throw his body down an old well. If he says the stories were as large as goose eggs they put him on the free list for life and drag him upstairs to a saloon and "set 'em up." P. S.—A farmer was never killed in the West for not getting the hail-stones large enough to please the fancy of the editors in that section.—Norristown (Pa.) Herald.

HOME, FARM AND GARDEN.

—You cannot successfully pot your house plants one week and neglect them the next.—Iowa Register.

—Try top-dressing grass, with fair soil or subsoil—and sand, even if the meadow is wet—and you'll be surprised at the way the grass will grow.

—We never knew, or even heard tell of a farmer, who kept out of debt, going into bankruptcy, or even complaining of hard times.—C. F. Clarkson.

—BonselHam.—Having soaked a well-cured ham in tepid water over night, boil it until it is perfectly tender, putting it on the ingredients in warm water; take it up in a wooden tray and leave it to cool. Afterward remove the bone carefully, and press the ham again into shape; return it to the boiling liquor, remove the pot from the fire, and let the ham remain until it is cold.

—After a broomstick has outlived its usefulness as part of a carpet-cleaner, it may be made to minister to one's health by cutting off the broom and using it as a gymnastic wand. Spend five minutes each night and morning in lifting the wand high over the head in both hands, palms front, and then drawing the wand down behind, letting the stick fall behind the shoulders. The most obstinate case of crookedness will yield to this remedy, unless the deformity has existed from birth.—N. Y. Times.

—As the season of frosts is approaching, when tender plants are liable to be frozen, it is of advantage to know how to save them. Cold water will do it, but it must not be applied in the light. Cover them so they may be entirely dark and excluded from the air. After treated thus, all except very tender ones will come out all right. It is even better that they be not watered while frozen. The proper way is, when the frost has been partially drawn out of them, naturally, to drench them with cold water from a fine-nosed watering-pot, and immediately cover again and let them so remain until they regain their natural color. When they are removed, clip off all such parts as are blackened. The latter way, however, in the fall, is to remove all tender plants to the house or else carefully cover them when frost may be feared. Thus, dahlias, cannas and the tender geraniums plants may be made to do duty in the West for a month longer than usual, since one can thus wait for a few frosty nights, and after that a long season of beautiful weather for weeks.—Prairie Farmer.

Dairying and Grain-Raising.

The temptation during the first fifteen years of the settlement of all our States has been to use those constant crops of grain, and, making no return of value for feeding, it has been burned to get it out of the way. If the straw were evenly distributed over the land on which it grew and burned, it would return a large proportion of the mineral constituents required in the grain crop, but this is never done, and only a small number is used. It is necessary that some compensation should be provided for this great drain upon the fertility of the soil. The only permanent compensation to the soil for the losses in crops is in stock feeding. Every country that has held a respectable position in agriculture has done it by feeding stock to its full capacity. England has doubled her wheat product during the last fifty years, and has also doubled her stock feeding. She has beside shown her wisdom in using immense quantities of bones and guano.

This country is becoming the grain producers for a large part of Europe, and is no doubt destined to greatly increase this surplus of breadstuffs; and is it not high time that our farmers lend earnest upon the practice of a sensible system of compensation for their depletion of the soil by cropping? Our dairy products are finding new and wider markets, year by year, and the farmers are yet destined to reach as high figure as in most exports. Dairying is already adapted to the conditions of grain raising. Its product is marketable at all times of the year. The returns may be had from month to month, or even weekly, and thus assists the farmer in paying expenses between the annual crops. The cow gives a better return for the food consumed than the steer—that is, her product brings a much larger sum than the growth of the steer. The average cow produces 4,000 pounds of milk, which will make 400 pounds of cheese or 180 pounds of butter. This cheese will bring during any series of ten years, at least $40, and the butter $45 to $50, whilst the growth of an ordinary steer will not reach more than half these sums. The best cows, as also the best steers, will just about double these figures, but there is generally a large balance in favor of the cow over the steer beside the return far steers only comes once in two and one-half to four years. I advocate the propriety of keeping only the best steers, for the profit must be very small on the poorer classes of stock, kept for any purpose; but our comparison is drawn between the best grades of such as are generally kept.

Grain-raising produces a large amount of straw, which, by a little study of the combination of foods, will enable the farmer to carry his cows through the winter. A little grain mixed with straw will give a proper balance of constituents. The grain farm may have plenty of land near the barn in condition to raise those annual manure crops adapted to feeding milch cows. These are winter rye for early spring soiling or pasturing—rye makes good pasturing—oats, oats and peas; peas alone, and oats; Hungarian grass, millet and Indian corn. The oat and pea crop (one of oats to two of peas) makes one of the most desirable combinations of food for the production of milk. It should be cut when the peas in blossom. Hungarian grass on a light and fine soil produces a large growth of excellent food for feeding green, or even for pasturing, if not fed too close, and also makes excellent hay if cut and cured before blossom. It becomes too woody if allowed to ripen. The same may be said of millet. But for profitable stock feeding or dairying, much reliance should be placed upon clover, both for pasture and winter feeding. Clover fed with straw in winter—an equal weight of each—makes a well-balanced food. Grain and shall have clover every third year in the rotation. The clover penetrates deeply and brings up the dormant fertility of the subsoil. The roots ramify the extensively and furnish such a body of vegetable matter to decay in the soil as to furnish an important food for plants, being freely raised and fed to cows in connection with straw and surplus grain, will not only produce milk profitably, but will compensate the farmer for grain-raising.—Rural New Yorker.

Mr. Gladstone on Manual Work.

Mr. Gladstone in a recent speech at Hawarden said:

"But needlework is a great deal more than an ornament to every-day existence. It was highly indeed, almost into fine art; and if I am to speak of subjects connected with the means of subsistence, although needlework in its lower branches is the worst-paid labor in the whole country, yet needlework in its higher branches is very well paid indeed, and to you young persons who are practising or learning needlework, and who, of course, do not be content with practising it in its lower forms, but learn the nature of embroidery, and see what you can do in practising it of the higher kinds of needlework. In the first place, it is an improving process, and, in the second, it is a gainful one, and generally I would advise that the people of this country should give more attention than they do to raising hand labor of all kinds to the exclusion of the machine product. They are too fond of getting out of hand labor and getting into what they call labor-saving machinery, by say, getting sufficiently acquainted with reading and writing and casting up accounts perhaps to get into the lower class of clerks. I do not believe that there is a more distressed class in the country than that class, and I believe that a great number of young people would do infinitely better for themselves and for their country if they were content to keep much more than they do to the use of their hands and would try to raise the character of the labor which they perform with their hands, because, pray remember this, that a great deal of the very highest labor is labor performed with the hands.

"Look at the labor of the painter, or the sculptor, and, not only so, but look at a great many intermediate kinds of labor—hand labor which is strictly all dependent on an excellent hand. Now, there is a great deficiency of that kind of labor in this country. Go into the study of a sculptor in London and you will find that the sculptor, probably an Englishman, is obliged to have a great many assistants, because working at the marble requires very much to be done before the stage of the finishing touches, and those assistants are well paid; but if you come to talk to them you will find that in the large majority of cases they are not Englishmen at all, but Italians and Frenchmen—very commonly Italians. What I want you to do is this—not to be in such a hurry to get into so low a class of lead labor as copying-clerks or something of that kind. People should reconsider whether being freely raised and fed to cows in connection with straw and surplus grain, will not produce milk and butter of a quality which is capable of being raised to a much higher description of art and of yielding a very high standard of remuneration.

"I cannot tell you how anxious I am to impress that upon the mind of young people, and how certain I feel that the question is one of great importance to the people of this country. Let them perform their work in the spirit of an artist, let them try to give it excellence and make it a thing that not only will sell, but as good as they can make it, as useful, as well put together, as well proportioned, as pleasing to the eye, as fall of beauty as they can make it, and the more they try to do it the better they will be able to do it."

Or CHILLS and FEVER.
The proprietor of this celebrated medicine justly claims for it a superiority over all remedies ever offered to the public for the SAFE, CERTAIN AND PERMANENT CURE of Ague and Fever, or Chills and Fever, whether of short or long standing. No refers to the entire Western and Southern country to bear him testimony to the truth of the assertion that in no case has it ever failed to cure when the directions were strictly followed and carried out. In a great many cases a single dose has been sufficient; very acute and obstinate cases have been cured by a single bottle, with a perfect restoration to health. It is, however, prudent, and in every case more certain to cure, if its use is continued in smaller doses for a week or two after the patient has been checked, more especially in difficult and long-standing cases. Usually this medicine will not require a alds to keep the bowels in good order. Should the patient, however, require a cathartic medicine, after having taken three or four doses of the Tonic, a single dose of BULL'S VEGETABLE FAMILY PILLS will be sufficient.
Remember SMITH'S TONIC SYRUP must have DR. JOHN BULL'S private stamp on each bottle. DR. JOHN BULL only has the right to manufacture and sell the original JOHN J. General News Summary.

DOMESTIC.

SIMONI, the Italian, who, some months ago, murdered Nicholas McCue, in the streets of Chicago, was arraigned in the Criminal Court of that city, on the 16th, and, to the surprise of all except his counsel, entered the plea of guilty. The punishment for his admitted crime must be either hanging or imprisonment for life, at the discretion of the presiding Judge.

On the 17th, the reunion of the Twenty-third Ohio Volunteer Infantry (better known as "President Hayes' Regiment") occurred at Willoughby, and over 10,000 people were present. President Hayes and family, Gen. Hastings and other distinguished personages were in attendance. A short and pleasant speech by President Hayes (who was presiding officer of the day) in response to the welcoming address by Major Ellis, was loudly applauded.

A SCHOOL-DISTRICT election was held in New Haven, Conn., on the 16th, the town being the establishing of devotional exercises in the public schools. The ticket favoring such re-establishment was successful by 2,300 majority. The Catholics voted with the Protestants.

AT Baltimore, on the 17th, the Grand Lodge of Odd-Fellows, in session in that city, elected John R. Hanson, of California, Grand Sire, and Mr. Glenn, of Georgia, Deputy Grand Sire. The other officers were re-elected.

An amendment was adopted changing the title of the supreme body from "Grand Lodge of the United States," to that of "Grand Lodge of Independent Order of Odd-Fellows."

On the 21st, the United States Treasury disbursed 76,000 silver dollars. Since the order of Sec'y Sherman, revoking the previous order for the general issue of silver coin for greenback, the daily issue had been about $60,000. The Treasury held, on the 21st, $940,613,850 in United States bonds to secure National bank circulation; $42,726,500 in bonds to secure public deposits, and $5,873,100 to secure subscriptions to 4-per-cent. loans.

IT was reported from Washington, on the 23d, that the later advices from Hayti triumphantly claimed to have brought about an order which had been issued giving laborers at the Navy Yard a full day's pay for eight hours' work, and a full day and a quarter for ten hours' work. Similar orders had been issued in order to workmen on Government buildings in that city, and the rate of pay for laborers in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing had been raised from a dollar to a dollar and a quarter a day. It was also decided that the meetings and processions held by Cohen and his followers were riotous and disorderly. Orders had been issued to the police, and were being enforced, to prevent any further meetings or demonstrations of the kind.

THE Union Dime Savings Bank of Saratoga Springs, N. Y., has closed its doors, with liabilities amounting to $150,000. The announcement is made that all depositors will be paid in full.

GEN. SHERIDAN received a dispatch, on the 23d, from Gen. Miles, at Fort Keogh, in Montana Territory, stating that all Sioux Indians had just reached that post direct from the British Possessions, and purporting to be bearers of a message from Sitting Bull, asking upon what terms he and his people would be allowed to surrender to the United States military authorities.

THE Odd-Fellows' Bank at Sacramento, Cal., has made an assignment.

YELLOW-FEVER NEWS.

IT was reported from the infected regions, on the 20th, that the fever was spreading in the country adjacent to the cities suffering from the plague, and that much unnecessary and alarm were created in the minds of the people who had previously reason to hope they might escape the contagion. Particularly was this the case in the smaller towns along the railroads leading out of Memphis. The President of the Baptist Relief Committee of Memphis had issued a circular to the Baptist friends throughout the Union, returning thanks for the generous and extended them, and saying that they had enough of money and supplies at present for a continuance of aid, but that asking for a continuance of those sympathy. The deaths in Memphis during the twenty-four hours ending at noon, on the 23d, numbered sixty-four; in New Orleans, forty; at Hickman, Ky., seven; at Canton, Miss., six; Grand Junction, Tenn., three.

THERE were 134 new cases reported in New Orleans, on the 23d; deaths forty-four. The total cases to that date were 2,572, and deaths, 2,614. The disease was evidently abating.

THE fever was still raging without abatement at Canton, Miss., on the 23d; new cases, twenty-three, and one death. A telegram from Martin, Tenn., says the condition of affairs in that town was deplorable from the absence of any organized system of relief. Several citizens were down with the fever. Ten new cases and four deaths were reported at Hickman, Ky.

THERE were fifteen new cases and five deaths at Holly Springs, Miss., on the 23d, and more physicians and nurses were needed. The disease there was on the increase. Additional help was also called for from several other towns in Louisiana and Mississippi.

THERE were seven deaths in Vicksburg on the 23d. The fever had decreased so much there that physicians and nurses were leaving for other points.

OVER $300,000 had been collected in New York City up to the 23d for the yellow-fever sufferers. The amount in St. Louis was over $70,000, and in Chicago over $80,000, with corresponding amounts in other cities and towns.

THE hope was entertained, in Memphis, on the 23d, that the fever in that city was abating; but this hope was dispelled to the contrary on the 24th. A great demand for nurses had again arisen, and the deaths for twenty-four hours, ending at six o'c numbered sixty-four. Cries of distress continued to come in from the surrounding country. In some instances, in the suburbs, it was discovered, by physicians of the Howard Association, that whole families had been sick for several days, without being cared for by either physicians or nurses. The number of new cases reported on the 23d was 196. The population in the city was estimated at 8,000.

PERSONAL AND POLITICAL.

THE Connecticut Democratic State Convention was held at New Haven, on the 17th, and the present State officers were nominated for re-election, headed by Robert D. Hubbard for Governor. Lieut.-Gov. Loomis declined a renomination and Charles Durand, of Derby, was selected in his stead. The platform adopted condemns all repudiation and demands an honest and just payment of the public debt; that gold and silver are recognized by the Constitution as the standard money of the Union, and constitute the most stable basis for the commercial necessities of the world; that the Resumption act was not called for, and was unwise at the time of its passage, but the Representatives of the State in Congress are called upon to exercise wise judgment in their action upon the question of resumption at this time.

A STATE Democratic Convention was held in Worcester, Mass., on the 17th. The Convention was largely composed of delegates acting in the interest of Gen. Butler for Governor, and these had taken the precaution to secure all the halls in the city, so that when the trouble came, the dissatisfied ones could find no place for meeting. The State Central Committee, who were opposed to Butler, seeing that his nomination was inevitable, thereupon declared an adjournment to Faneuil Hall, Boston, and fixed the time for holding the Convention on the 25th of September. Mr. Butler's friends thereupon organized by the selection of Hon. Richard I. Spofford as Permanent Chairman, and placed the following ticket in nomination: Governor, Benjamin F. Butler; Lieutenant-Governor, John F. Arnold; Secretary of State, Charles M. Straus; Attorney-General, Caleb Cushing; Auditor, J. Boyle O'Reilly; Treasurer, D. N. Skillings. The platform adopted reiterates the adhesion of the Massachusetts Democracy to old-time Democratic principles; condemns the prevailing extravagance in the Administration of State and National affairs; favors the reservation of the public domain for actual settlers; condemns the fraud by which President Hayes was declared elected; declares the Republican party immeasurably corrupt; indorses the platform adopted in 1875; deprecates the placing of restrictions in the way of exercising the right of suffrage, etc., etc.

THERE being no choice for Governor in Maine (the Constitution requiring a clear majority over all opposing candidates), the duty of selecting a Governor will devolve upon the Legislature which meets in January next. The process is for the House of Representatives to select two persons by ballot from those who were voted for at the popular election, and certify their names to the Senate, by which body one of the two is declared Governor.

THE Republicans of the First New Jersey District have nominated Hon. George M. Robeson, Secretary of the Navy under President Grant, for Congress.

THE Democratic members of the Oregon Legislature have elected J. H. Slater, to succeed Mr. Mitchell in the United States Senate. In a recent interview, Mr. Slater said he is not in sympathy with inflation. He advocates the substitution of legal-tenders for National Bank notes, opposes fiat money and demands that currency shall be on a coin basis.

THE Massachusetts Republicans met at Worcester, in State Convention, on the 20th, and placed in nomination the following ticket: Governor, Hon. Thomas Talbot; Lieutenant-Governor, John D. Long; Secretary of State, Henry L. Pierce; Treasurer, Charles Endicott; Auditor, the present incumbent; Attorney-General, George Marston. The resolutions congratulate the State and Nation on the near approach of specie payments; insist that the paper, silver and gold issues of the country shall be equal in value; advise the continued refunding of the public debt, at a lower rate of interest; demand economy in the administration of State and National affairs; commend the President for his firmness and integrity, etc., etc.

THE Republicans of Nevada held their State Convention, on the 19th. A platform was adopted declaring the validity of Hayes' title to the Presidency, and denouncing the Potter investigation as revolutionary; demanding that the coinage of silver be placed on an equal footing with gold; favoring Legislative and Congressional control of railroads. R. M. Daggett was nominated for Congress, and J. H. Kinkaid for Governor.

IN response to letters, signed by many prominent citizens of Wisconsin, ex-Senator Carpenter has consented to be a candidate for United States Senator before the Legislature next winter.

ON the 19th, the State National Convention met at New Orleans, La., and nominated Gen. Beauregard for State Treasurer. That gentleman declined, and Dr. J. S. Gardner, of Baton Rouge, was substituted.

THE Montana Territorial Democratic Convention met in Virginia City, on the 19th, and nominated Hon. Martin Maginnis as Delegate in Congress.

D. N. SKILLINGS, the candidate of the Butler wing of the Massachusetts Democracy for State Treasurer, and J. Boyle O'Reilly, the candidate for State Auditor, have declined their respective nominations, the former because he does not approve the methods of the party, and the latter because he had rather be editor than Auditor.

ACCORDING to a Cracow (Poland) telegram of the 20th, many arrests had been made at Odessa and Kharkow, in consequence of the discovery of a plot to liberate the imprisoned Nihilists.

ACCORDING to Calcutta dispatches of the 20th, the Ameer of Afghanistan had positively refused to grant permission for the British Embassy to Cabul to pass through the Khyber Pass, and that the Embassy had been compelled to return to Peshawur.

THE Russian troops have altogether evacuated their long-occupied position at San Stefano, and have been succeeded by Turkish troops.

CONSTANTINOPLE dispatches of the 21st say that Greek filibusters had passed into Turkey with a view to incite another insurrection in Thessaly and Epirus.

ACCORDING to Bombay (India) dispatches of the 23d, the feeling there over the discovery of the Ameer of Afghanistan was exceedingly warlike. A force of 12,000 men had been gathered on the frontier, and the determination was expressed to compel an apology from the Ameer, or occupy the country.

VIENNA dispatches of the 23d report the successful advance of the Austrians against the insurgent position in the Northern Bosnia. The rebel position near Senkotes had been captured, two days before, after a battle of seven days' duration. The Austrian loss was 600 killed and wounded. The insurgent loss was greater. The Towns of Bejelina and Livas had also been captured.

A Husband's Hobby.

Mr. Waite is a model husband—that is to say, in a good many respects. He [illegible] drinks, smokes nor chews, stays home at evenings, never gambles and gives his wife all the money that she wants. It is said that all men have some idiosyncrasy or hobby. Mr. Waite has his. It is a downright mania for attending auction sales and buying articles of every description, at [illegible] Toodles, without regard as to whether they will ever be of any practical or imaginary use to him. As long as he gets them at a bargain, he is satisfied. A good joke about this peculiarity of his was related to me the other evening by a friend of his. Mr. Waite went to an auction sale of a dealer in sporting goods. He bought 200 dinnerbells at twenty cents a pair and carried them home in triumph. He stored them in the cellar, where they remained for six months or so. Mrs. Waite got tired of seeing them occupying so much space, especially as she wanted the cellar for some purpose of her own. So, imagining that her husband had forgotten all about his recent acquisition, she sold the dumb-bells for a mere song to an auctioneer. That evening Mr. Waite returned home with a bandcart. His face was flushed but triumphant.

"Mother, if you can spare the money for me to make the journey, I believe I can find him, and get at least a part payment of what is owing to us."

It was a long time before she would listen to this proposal. She could ill afford the expense. Though we knew Harrisgford's note to my father, it was outlawed, and she had not much faith in my being able to get any money of him, even if he could be found in either of the two offices named.

At last, however, thinking the journey might do me some good, at any rate, she consented to it, and in July I set out.

I went first to Buffalo, where I began with the Postoffice and directory, but without success. As I knew the city he was searching for there, I proceeded to Detroit. No luck there either. I returned to Buffalo, stopping at Cleveland by the way, and finally gave up the search, concluding that Harringford must have gone elsewhere, and that the world was too large a haystack for me to hunt in for such a needle.

But my mother had told me to be sure to visit Niagara before my return; so, one afternoon, I went down by a late train to the Falls, which I saw by moonlight for the first time.

I was of course too poor to go to a first-class hotel, but put up at one both small and obscure. The next morning was fine. I was in good spirits, in spite of the failure of my undertaking, for I had youth and health. I passed the day at the Falls, but, for economy's sake, I felt that I ought to leave on the night train for Utica. So I prepared to take leave of the great cataract.

"But I am going to drink out of it first, anyway," I said to a young man whose acquaintance I had made that afternoon.

The American shore of the river was no, fenced in from the public in those days, as I found it when I was there a year ago. We stood at the very brink, near the edge of the fall. The wild, tumbling rapids shot past us, seemed to pause an instant on the verge, broke into curves of marvelous green water, then crumbled into masses of foam, and fell thundering into the abyss.

With that view before me, boy-like, I got down on my hands and knees for my drink. My lips touched the swift water. I had my drink, and was about to rise, when something dropped out of the inner breast-pocket of my coat, and shot away from my reach and sank from sight before I could put out my hand. In my astonishment, I was near making a long plunge in after it of the steaming gulf below brought me to my senses.

"Gone!" I explained, flinging up my hands in despair. "Did you see it?"

"See what?" said my companion.

"My pocket-book!" I replied, full of consternation. "It dropped from my coat-pocket into the water, and is lost. I came within a hair's breadth of going after it!"

He had seen nothing. I explained how it happened. I had always carried my pocket-book in that way and never dropped it before. But in stooping far forward to bring my lips to the water, I had emptied my pocket and lost, in an instant, all my money, together with that poor outlawed note of Harringford's, among other more or less valuable papers.

My chance acquaintance expressed his sympathy in well-sounding words, but all at once he appeared to have grown cold toward me. Perhaps he expected I should want to borrow money of him; for money I should certainly need in getting away from the Falls. I still had my hotel-bill to pay and I could not very well travel by rail for nothing.

We had already exchanged cards, and I had ascertained that his name was Eastmore—that he was a reporter, or journalist, on the staff of a Buffalo paper. I thought a young man of his experience ought to be able to give me good advice, if nothing else, and I begged him to tell me what to do.

"Have you any friend in town that you can call on for assistance?" he asked.

"Not one," I said, and added, without thinking how he would take it, "You are the only acquaintance I have here outside my hotel."

He laughed and looked embarrassed.

"That's bad!" he said. "I would be glad to lend you a dollar, if I had any to spare, but I haven't. Perhaps the hotel folks will help you, if you can convince them of the truth of your story."

A horrible suspicion flashed across my mind. I might pass for an impostor.

"The truth of it!" I exclaimed. "Why, I had my pocket-book right here, with twenty dollars in it. And what motive could I have in my business for inventing such a story as mine, in—"

"Of course you had your pocket-book," he answered, with a smile; "and mind, I don't say you have any motive for making a false pretension. But the world is full of impostors, who are always inventing excuses for borrowing money or for omitting to pay their bills. Hotel-keepers have to deal with such characters pretty often, and we can't blame them for being a trifle suspicious of men who have lost their pocket-books."

His must have been impressed by the horrified look I gave him, for he immediately went on—"Of course I am as much convinced that you lost your pocket-book in the way you say as if I had seen it go over myself. But even if I had seen it, I never saw the money in it—though I don't understand me to say that I have any doubt of the latter. I am only stating the case as it might look to other people. If you didn't carry such an honest face about with you—"

"I thank you for so much!" I said, bitterly; for now I perceived by something in his look and tone which he could not hide, that in his own mind, my story stood sadly in need of confirmation.

I couldn't blame him, however. Impostors are in the majority among smooth-tongued people in want of assistance; and the worst of their sin is that they throw discredit upon honest people who have been really unfortunate. I was destined to find that out to my sorrow.

I felt that the first thing to be done was to make my case known to my landlord, and I went back to the house. I told him, in as cool and business-like way as I could, what had happened, and asked him to trust me for the amount of my bill.

Eastmore went with me, and I hoped he would say something to corroborate my story; but he was very cautious. He stood at my elbow a little behind, and I suspect there was something in his face which did not help my cause.

The landlord, a short, stocky, red-visaged, wall-eyed Irishman, glanced over his shoulder with the one good eye he had, and seemed to receive intelligence to my disadvantage.

I turned quickly. I don't think Eastmore had made a signal, but he had not concealed his incredulity. I found then that I might better have gone alone to the landlord.

"I don't know anything about your losing your pocket-book," said the Irishman, after hearing me out. "If you have no money, you must get some. My business is to keep a hotel, and I can't furnish guests with board and lodging for the fine stories they may tell."

The words stung me, but I managed to reply calmly:

"I don't ask you to do any such thing. I shall pay you every cent I owe you. But I have lost my money, and can't very well travel to my home until I receive more."

Then it occurred to me that that was just what he would like to have me do. He could hold my valise for security, and my bill would be increasing, so I added:

"I shall be obliged to leave your house, anyway. If you will let me take my valise, I think I may get passed over the road without paying a dollar. I'll send you the two dollars I owe you as soon as I reach Utica."

He smiled.

"What time is it?" he asked. I took out my watch and told him. "That's a good-looking turnip," he said. "Let me see it, and you may take your baggage."

The watch had been my father's. I would have trusted it in his hands on any account.

"No thank you!" I said, and put it back into my pocket.

He saw that I distrusted him, and became abusive.

"You're a swindler!" he cried. "I've heard of you before. How many pocket-books have you lost this week? I've a set here that could eat them all, and lick her chops for more. Ah!"—he broke off in a instant, all my money, together with that poor outlawed note of Harringford's, among other more or less valuable papers.

My chance acquaintance expressed his sympathy in well-sounding words, but all at once he appeared to have grown cold toward me. Perhaps he expected I should want to borrow money of him; for money I should certainly need in getting away from the Falls. I still had my hotel-bill to pay and I could not very well travel by rail for nothing.

We had already exchanged cards, and I had ascertained that his name was Eastmore—that he was a reporter, or journalist, on the staff of a Buffalo paper. I thought a young man of his experience ought to be able to give me good advice, if nothing else, and I begged him to tell me what to do.

"Have you any friend in town that you can call on for assistance?" he asked.

"Not one," I said, and added, without thinking how he would take it, "You are the only acquaintance I have here outside my hotel."

He laughed and looked embarrassed.

"That's bad!" he said. "I would be glad to lend you a dollar, if I had any to spare, but I haven't. Perhaps the hotel folks will help you, if you can convince them of the truth of your story."

THE BABY BOYS.

Two little boys I own;
The elder scarcely walks alone;
His sunny hair and liquid brown eyes,
Represented look of sweet surprise.
His frame was round and plump and stout
And not tell you all about
If I should try a year.

He creeps so fast to catch his toys,
And then he sets up such a noise;
He hurts and dirts and bruises all,
He throws them all about pell-mell,
Oh, Mother Goose! if you could see
This little boy, so full of glee,
Your sides would ache, I fear.

In hammock low, among the trees,
Hooked back and forth by passing breeze,
The baby swings and coos to me
The gentle rustle of the tree.
The lights and shades, the leaves that fall;
The sunshine breeding over all—
Its lonesome summer here.

Way out in the yard, the other day,
The nimble clouds that softly fly,
A lullaby but Nature sings
And through the leaves its music rings;
All things peaceful lower keep;
My little one falls fast asleep;
His mother watching near.

Two baby boys I own of love
Sends me a gift from Heaven above;
And like the shining stars more bright,
Tinging the drifting clouds with light,
Their love to me so beautiful,
Beaming though mists of grief and doubt
And make my pathway clear.

GOOD-NIGHT.

Good-night!
Now the weary rest by night,
And the busy fingers bending
Over work that seems unending,
Tell no more till morning light—
Good-night!

Go to rest!
Close the eyes with slumber proud;
In the streets the silent crowding,
Wakes but to the watch-hour blowing,
Night makes only one request—
Go to rest!

Slumber sweet!
Blessed dreams to each dreamer greet,
He whom fear has kept from sleeping
In sweet dreams is o'er him creeping
May he his before meet—
Slumber sweet!

Good-night!
Slumber till the morning light,
Slumber till the world is waking,
Comes and brings its own new sorrow,
We are in the Father's keeping—
Good-night!

MY LOST POCKET-BOOK.

My name is Edney—Philip Clement Edney. That was my father's name before me. Twenty-old years ago he did a small but comfortable dry-goods business in Utica, but in the panic of '57 he met with severe losses; and he had hardly weathered the financial storm when he was taken down with a disease from which he never recovered.

In his last illness he was deeply concerned for the future of his family. I was the eldest son, and frequently expressed the hope, to my mother and to me, that in some way we should be able to find Harringford.

Thomas Harringford was a generous-hearted, but rather unprincipled, young man, who had been in my father's employ several years before.

He got into bad company and was guilty of some irregularity, as the modern genteel phrase is, having helped himself to my father's cash to the amount of several hundred dollars, before his dishonesty—I mean his irregularities—was discovered. He was penitent, and confessed everything, but it was impossible for him to make restitution.

He had been a favorite of both my father and mother, and they could not bear to have him sent to prison. So, on his promising to go West, lead an honest life in future, and repay my father, when he was able, the sums he had stolen—I mean misappropriated—he was let off.

He went to parts where he was unknown, and only vague rumors concerning him had reached us since. One of those rumors was that he had been seen in Buffalo and Detroit, and that he was doing a prosperous business.

On selling up my father's estate, my mother found that she and her little family were left in straitened circumstances. My eldest brother, Edward Clement Edney, had died of fever contracted in the prisons of Richmond, Va., during the war. My next brother, Frederick Augustus Edney, had settled in Detroit, but failed to receive answers. And so we were so much in need that I said:

"Mother, if you can spare the money for me to make the journey, I believe I can find him, and get at least a part payment of what is owing to us."

It was a long time before she would listen to this proposal. She could ill afford the expense. Though we knew Harringford's note to my father, it was outlawed, and she had not much faith in my being able to get any money of him, even if he could be found in either of the two offices named.

At last, however, thinking the journey might do me some good, at any rate, she consented to it, and in July I set out.

I went first to Buffalo, where I began with the Postoffice and directory, but without success. As I knew the city he was searching for there, I proceeded to Detroit. No luck there either. I returned to Buffalo, stopping at Cleveland by the way, and finally gave up the search, concluding that Harringford must have gone elsewhere, and that the world was too large a haystack for me to hunt in for such a needle.

But my mother had told me to be sure to visit Niagara before my return; so, one afternoon, I went down by a late train to the Falls, which I saw by moonlight for the first time.

I was of course too poor to go to a first-class hotel, but put up at one both small and obscure. The next morning was fine. I was in good spirits, in spite of the failure of my undertaking, for I had youth and health. I passed the day at the Falls, but, for economy's sake, I felt that I ought to leave on the night train for Utica. So I prepared to take leave of the great cataract.

"But I am going to drink out of it first, anyway," I said to a young man whose acquaintance I had made that afternoon.

The American shore of the river was no, fenced in from the public in those days, as I found it when I was there a year ago. We stood at the very brink, near the edge of the fall. The wild, tumbling rapids shot past us, seemed to pause an instant on the verge, broke into curves of marvelous green water, then crumbled into masses of foam, and fell thundering into the abyss.

With that view before me, boy-like, I got down on my hands and knees for my drink. My lips touched the swift water. I had my drink, and was about to rise, when something dropped out of the inner breast-pocket of my coat, and shot away from my reach and sank from sight before I could put out my hand. In my astonishment, I was near making a long plunge in after it of the steaming gulf below brought me to my senses.

"Gone!" I explained, flinging up my hands in despair. "Did you see it?"

"See what?" said my companion.

"My pocket-book!" I replied, full of consternation. "It dropped from my coat-pocket into the water, and is lost. I came within a hair's breadth of going after it!"

He had seen nothing. I explained how it happened. I had always carried my pocket-book in that way and never dropped it before. But in stooping far forward to bring my lips to the water, I had emptied my pocket and lost, in an instant, all my money, together with that poor outlawed note of Harringford's, among other more or less valuable papers.

My chance acquaintance expressed his sympathy in well-sounding words, but all at once he appeared to have grown cold toward me. Perhaps he expected I should want to borrow money of him; for money I should certainly need in getting away from the Falls. I still had my hotel-bill to pay and I could not very well travel by rail for nothing.

PERSONAL AND LITERARY.

—Mr. John G. Tappan, the Boston defaulter, who used to be very careful of his personal appearance, now goes about the streets of that city looking very forlorn and old.

—Prof. Collier, chemist of the Agricultural Department, at Washington, is engaged in some very important experiments, to show whether or not sugar can be made from common cornstalks.

—Sir Garnet Wolseley, the British commander now in charge of the Island of Cyprus, is first cousin of Mrs. Wakeman, the wife of a physician at Redding, Conn., and corresponds regularly with the family.

—Ex-Gov. English, of New Haven, was visited by a tramp, the other day, who begged for an old pair of shoes, and after receiving them returned in an hour or two and asked for twenty cents to pay for getting them mended.

—It is reported that the Western Union Telegraph Company has made a contract with Mr. Edison to pay $6,000 a year for thirty-four years on condition that he will give the company all right, title and interest in his telegraphic inventions.

—Utter surprise that among the stocks turned over to the Elliot Bank of Boston by R. B. Conant, the late cashier, was a large amount of stock in a sliding dime. Conant, it seems, was a man of advanced in price within a few weeks from 80 to $100 a share, more than making up all his previous losses.

—The Paris correspondent of the San Francisco Chronicle says that the penurious millionaire, Michael Reese, to avoid the entrance fee, sealed the fence of the German Cemetery, containing the graves of his parents and was brought before the Burgomaster, and that the excitement thereby produced caused his death.

On the banks of the "blue Juniata," in Huntington County, stands the quiet little Town of Alexandria. Years ago, and about the beginning of the war, a man, the terror of the country, known as "Lewis, the robber." Many a wagoner on the old Pittsburgh and Philadelphia Pike was bereft by force of his valuables. Last week two gentlemen went out hunting on Short Mountain, a mile or two west of town. They shot a squirrel, which, wounded, ran into the trunk of a large oak. What was their surprise when, grasping the hollow trunk for their game, to discover an old Dutch oven full of Spanish doubloons, Mexican dollars, English sovereigns and other coins, all dated previous to the year 1820. Several packages of papers were found which crumbled to dust as soon as touched. Their glittering wealth, which they divided among them, amounted to several thousand dollars. It is supposed that all this wealth was deposited in the tree by "Lewis, the robber."—Altoona (Pa.) Tribune.

CIRCUMSTANTIAL evidence caused the arrest of Simeon Bradley, of Boston, the other day, and he will owe to good luck his escape from conviction. A workman was sent to a house to make some repairs, and immediately after his departure a valuable gold watch and chain were missing. No one but himself knew anything of the house that entered the room containing the jewelry, so far as known; he was charged with the theft, and, though he denied it persistently, was arrested. The owner of the property soon learned, however, that the watch had been removed by her little daughter, and every effort was make to repair the wrong to the imprisoned man. He, however, declined all overtures or offers of compensation, and proposes to have the case go into court and receive his acquittal there.—N. Y. Post.

INCIDENTS AND ACCIDENTS.

—A collision between the great steamer Farnley, during her recent voyage from New York, and a large emigrant ship, was averted by the use of the electric light, it was on the Banks of Newfoundland, at night, during a dense fog, that the brilliant light on the steamer revealed the sailing vessel straight ahead. There was just time to reverse the engines and prevent what would have been an awful catastrophe.

—Mr. Bishop, the guide at the Profile House, in the White Mountains, recently loosened a rock that weighed at least three tons, on Canyon Mountain, about twenty rods north of the Old Man of the Mountain. It went plunging down toward the Pemigewasset, cutting off trees a foot in diameter, and making a complete path through the woods in its descent. It filled the air with stones and made a terrific noise. Persons in that neighborhood who were in the woods ran for their lives.

—A young Frenchman died in Lyons, recently, from the effects of lighting a match. He scratched it with his thumb-nail, and a piece of the incandescent phosphorus penetrated under the nail and made a slight burn, to which he paid no attention. But, after an hour, the pain became very great. He then swelled, then the hand and next the forearm. He was obliged to slight at the first station and send for a medical man, who decl

OUR RADIX LETTER.

New York, Oct. 10, 1878.

EDITOR SENTINEL.

The semi-annual trade book sale here is always an interesting occasion and is one which grows in importance year by year. Its idea, when first instituted, was to enable publishers and dealers to clear off by auction each spring and fall the surplus or unsalable stock which they might find on hand at the time of its occurrence. By degrees, however, this use of the trade sale become secondary to another, namely, the ascertaining of the real market value of different works by putting up small lots of each and noting the prices obtained. Doing this year by year and comparing the figures brought by any given book at different times furnishes the publisher the most reliable indications of the growth or decline of its popularity. Nearly all the great publishing houses now avail themselves of this method which has in consequence gained great importance. The fall sale for 1878, just closed, lasted eight days and disposed of a large quantity of books.

It was a noticeable fact that the heavier classes of reading found the greatest favor. Scientific and religious works brought relatively larger figures than either new or standard fiction, Buckle and John Stuart Mill leading Dickens and Thackeray, and Webster's Dictionary being held at stiffer prices than anything else in the catalogue. More than 1,000 of the various editions were sold and had the publishers been willing to drop fifty cents from their usual rates 20,000 copies of the Unabridged could have been easily disposed of.

Seeing these facts in the report of the trade-side reminds me of a flying visit that I made to the office of the Merriams when in Springfield a few months ago. This firm, owning and publishing the remarkable "Unabridged," was started under the style of G. & C. Merriam as far back as 1831 and for a full generation its founders were its only members. Of late years a third brother has been admitted, but no change was made in the name which will soon have completed a half century of existence. The concern published at first only law books; but coming at length into relations with Noah Webster, their attention was turned to educational publishing, and they issued the famous "Webster's Speller," of which they still own the copyright, and of which I suppose some forty or fifty millions of copies must have been printed. Their great work, however, has been the publication of the dictionary, and this I firmly believe has been and still is to them as much a labor of love as of profit. The shrewdness, liberality and vigor with which they have handled it from the start are the admiration of the whole book trade, and can hardly fail to have been remarked by the most casual observer. Having been impressed by these qualities one is hardly prepared for the quiet and the rather quaint, old fashioned air of the venerable office, itself located on a side street of a provincial city, where so much important and effective work is planned, and whose influence is so extensive with the language.

During my brief call here I saw nothing of interest that I have space to describe. I was shown, among other things, a copy of the first "Revised Edition" of the Dictionary published in 1847; and by comparing this with the latest copy could obtain a good idea as to the changes and growth of our etymology during these thirty years. The way in which Webster's lists have been made to keep pace with this constant progress, and even to aid and shape the latter would make a most interesting letter by itself. The mass of manuscript which I saw just as it came from the most eminent specialists of Europe and America, and which forms a part only of the copy from which the present edition was electrotyped, gives some idea of the vast amount of labor and research which must have been expended in order that its results, boiled down to the extreme of condensation, should fill nearly 3,000 printed quarto pages. When next you have occasion to look upon a word in Webster's, just notice what a stupendous head-work and hand-work its compilation and arrangement, its type-setting and proof reading, its wood engraving, printing and binding have involved.

The sudden and mysterious disappearance from Marquette, Michigan, of the books of the New York Iron Mining Company, which were to have been used in the income suit against Ex-Governor Tilden, was supplemented by a small comedy in this city. Under the supposition that missing books might be found in Mr. Tilden's possession our Assistant United States District Attorney procured a warrant authorizing a search of that gentleman's trunk, which was expected from the west. Numerous deputies were stationed at the Grand Central Depot, and baggage from the west was examined or carefully criticised. In the meanwhile the sought for trunk slipped through the fingers of the anxious officials without being noticed, and the momentous question of "who stole the books" is still an open one.

Amusements here, if we include out door sports under that head, are brisk. Close on the close of the rifle tournament at Creedmoor comes the great cricket contest between a picked eleven from Australia and several of our home clubs which has the special attraction of novelty and which is doing much to popularize this distinctively English game at which the scores show that we are already but little behind our athletic cousins. Then there is the great walking match between O'Leary and Hughes for 1,000 and the champion belt won in England by the former, and more exciting than all other contests of this nature we have had the telegraphic reports from the long delayed and hotly contested rowing match at Lachine between Courtney and Hanlan in which the representative of the States was finally whipped by the invincible Canadian to the great sorrow of the crowds who had anxiously watched the bulletin boards for days in hopes of a different result.

And by the way, can any one tell what there is about two men's trying to see who can pull his boat up and down the river the quickest, that can so interest and excite a million or so of people, most of whom hardly know the bow of a shell from its stern, and who would hardly give a moment's thought or attention to an international discussion, like, for example, the late Fisheries Commission, involving millions of money and the possibility of grave diplomatic complications? This question is altogether too much for me, but its facts are indisputable.

In the line of city amusements proper, we have more than I can record. At the Fifth Avenue Theater Mary Anderson has just closed her brilliant engagement to make way for the refined and delicate Mme Modjeska who is now captivating critics alike by her artistic powers. The rollicking absurdities and exquisite caricatures of the Florences in "The Mighty Dollar" fill the Grand Opera House with laughter and applause. Thomas has evoked the swan's song of his peerless orchestra amid mingled tears and cheers, and now leaves for his new home in the West. Wilhelmj, the greatest of violinists, is taxing the vocabulary of the critics at Steinway Hall. Rose Eytinge at the Broadway, Henry VIII at Booth's with Genevieve Ward as Queen Catherine, and novelties at the Union Square and the minor theatres complete a list of great variety and attractiveness.

RADIX.

The Gallant Greenback.

The greenback is extolled as the money of the war, the gallant, glorious greenback that carried us through. Senator Morton did not disdain this stuff, and it is now very familiar. But without considering the necessity of the Legal Tender Act at the time of its passage, and conceding that the greenback currency was most serviceable during the war, it is evident that it was not so for any of the reasons that are urged for its illimitable or irredeemable issue, or for the printing of an indefinite quantity of paper and calling it "fiat" or "absolute" money. The greenback carried us through the war because it was a promise which it was believed would be fulfilled. The greenback did not call itself a dollar, but it pledged the government to pay a dollar when it was successful. Does any "Greenbacker" suppose that if it had been issued as "fiat" or "absolute" money, the result would have been the same? Creditors could not have refused it, of course, for old debts if it had been made a legal tender; but who could have compelled a man to sell the products of a day's labor for a piece of brown paper?

The same principle applies to the demand of the Greenback party that the Government shall make the money, and issue enough of it to secure full wages to labor. How is this to be done? How is this so called money to be put in circulation? Of course it is not to be given away; for it is the duty of government to give money to those who ask for it, who will work, who will do the labor of production? But if it is not to be given away, it is said that at least the bonds may be paid with it. How would this help the laboring poor man? In the first place, such a "payment" would be the most flagrant breach of faith upon the part of the Government, so that no man in the world would then trust its word for a penny; and in the second place, every enterprise and industry would be paralyzed by the confusion and uncertainty and loss of confidence that would follow this repudiation, and by that paralysis labor would be stopped and starved. The truth is that we cannot break faith in any direction, or even propose to break it, without paying for it, and the organized agitation to persuade the country to agree to break faith prodongs and deepens the prostration of industry.

"If the "fiat" or "absolute" money is not to be given away, but is to be issued in payment of the public debts, it will be paid to the holders of the debt in the first place, and will only gradually come into the hands of the laboring man. Hence would result a condition which has been well stated by Mr. Poor in his Hand Book of the Times, which is worth careful attention for its historical survey of paper money as well as for many of its financial suggestions. The result of paying paper for the debt would be the decline of every industry, and the consequent decline of demand for labor. The poorer man would then be forced to sell his actual property, so that the paper would gradually pass into the hands of the poor, and the actual property of the country into those of the rich. But as the laborer found that the paper, whether you call it "fiat" or "absolute" money, or whatever else you call it, would only buy a variable value of necessities, measured in gold, which is always the standard, he would himself demand the gold, that he might have some certainty and know the value of his money. It is but another illustration of the fact that government may call anything it chooses money, but it can not make money by a law, nor by any quantity of printing. It cannot force a man to give a day's work for a bad egg. There is nothing new or true in the doctrines of the Greenback party. The French assignats and our old continental currency were "fiat" money. The Continental was the great currency of the Revolution. But that did not enable a hundred dollars of it to buy a pair of shoes. The greenback was the currency of the war for the Union. But it was as honored and honorable currency only because it was believed to be the promise of an honorable nation.—Harper's Weekly.

Bijah and Novel-Reading.

A motherly-looking woman, about fifty years of age, entered the parlor, and when invited to divide her burden of woe and anxiety she began:

"Mr. Joy, I have a daughter."

"And I have three," was his encouraging reply.

"This daughter of ours is a dear girl, Mr. Joy. She is our only child, and of course we are concerned about her future."

"Very likely, madam. I used to be concerned for fear my daughters would marry blind men."

"Our daughter has a passion for reading, Mr. Joy. She reads about ten novels per week, and often sits up till midnight to read the story-papers. Her father and I have been wondering if she is not reading a little too much. I was reading by you see, and I thought I'd call in and see you about it. Do you think this novel-reading will affect her future? What would you advise?"

"Well, if I had a daughter," he slowly replied, "I think I'd let her read about twenty-four novels per week; I'd let her sit up till midnight, and I'd shed till noon; I'd hire a servant to cook her hair and cook her canaries; I wouldn't let her lift her hand to house work, and I'd practice her till she could pound a piano and drawl her voice in a fashionable way."

"And then?" she queried as he paused.

"Then, when she was old enough to marry, the whole family would turn out and hunt down a husband for her, wish 'em much joy, and——"

"And what?"

"And know that she would make him the most miserable wretch in town, madam! Don't teach your daughter to sweep or cook, because it is unfashionable. Don't teach her to know butter from beef-bones, because it will affect her standing in society. Don't teach her to cut and baste and fit and sew, because some one may suspect that her grandmother invented the needle. Bring her up to be nothing and know nothing. Get her three average servant girls to run her house for her, and if her husband doesn't run away or commit suicide within eight months it's because he hasn't brains enough to come in out of the rain!"

"Mr. Joy, I shall not take your advice!" she indignantly replied.

"My dear woman, I haven't given you any," he humbly remarked.

"I think we know enough to manage our daughter, sir!"

"I believe you, madam."

"And she shall read all the novels she wants to, sir!"

"She shall, madam; I have a dozen to lend you."

The woman rushed out in an indignant manner, leaving a cloud of dust behind, and the old man fought a fly off his bald head and mused:

"If any wife who can jump out of bed at midnight and run down-stairs and mix a mustard plaster in the dark, or knock an old barrel to pieces and cook dinner for fifteen country relations at twenty minutes' notice, hasn't of no account in this world, but I'vegot just an hour and a half to argy that point with some human hyena."—Detroit Free Press.

Civilization of Ants.

At the recent meeting of the British Association Sir John Lubbock read an interesting paper on the present state of civilization among the ants. In the course of it he confirmed the experiments of Huber as to their being able to recognize their friends, even after a long absence, or rather their acquaintances; for, although he saw that they attacked and killed their enemies, he could not find any trace of warm affection for their friends. He tested this by taking some out of a nest and suspending them in a bottle covered with muslin. Those in the nest took no notice of them, but when strangers were put in they were indignant and never stopped until they cut through the muslin and attacked them. He marked some nuts in a nest with paint and found that their friends removed it, but a stranger going into the nest was pounced on and got out as quickly as possible. It would be interesting to know how they recognize their friends. It might be by smell or some sign, or by actual recognition.

In order to try whether they could recognize them when insensible, he first used chloroform, but that practically killed them, and he then made them intoxicated. This did not bring them into whisky, not whisky into them, for they were too sensible to take it even on week days. He tried an experiment with twenty-five friends and thirty strangers. The sober ants, coming out of the nests, and finding the intoxicated ants lying helpless on their backs in indicrous attitudes, proceeded to take them up and carry them off. Of the twenty-five they brought twenty into the nest, where, probably, they soon slept off the effects. The other five they dropped into the moat of water which then surrounded the nest. Why they did so he could not tell. Perhaps they fell into the hands of stern teetotalers. As to the thirty strangers, twenty-eight were thrown into the moat and the other two were taken notice of. He took some pupæ out of a nest, and, on putting them back after some months, found that they were received as friends, while some which were put into a different nest were attacked. It was generality stated that all the eggs in the nest of ants of Queens were laid by Queens. That was not strictly so, for some were laid by workers, though the cases were exceptional. He had some nests in which there were no Queens, and others there were ants in them, but the eggs laid by workers always produce males. He had made some experiments to test the sense of sight. He found that they were capable of distinguishing between different colors, and avoided violet. Their sense of smell was also delicate, but he had seen no proof that they were capable of hearing, and he had proved by an experiment, which he described, that they were not capable of communicating with each other by sound. There were thirty species of ants in these countries, and 700 in other countries, and there were many interesting problems to be solved in relation to them.

Sir Walter Elliott asked how ants communicated with each other, and mentioned that on one occasion in India, when making a preparation of a spider, an ant approached and attempted to carry off the specimen. He drove it away, and then five others came, and, having occasion to leave the room, he found on his return that the specimen was gone. The President observed that perhaps in tropical regions the ants were more civilized, and possessed a power of communicating with each other which was not enjoyed by ants elsewhere.

Artemus Ward as a Practical Joker.

Browne and Griswold, "the Fat Contributor," were on newspaper work at the same time in Cleveland, and were very intimate friends. One day there came to the city a dramatic reader, a man of some note, but of a very timid disposition. These two worthies in some manner discovered that he was a person easily to be imposed upon, and shortly after his arrival they paid him a visit. It was an early hour in the morning—long after the man had retired—and they found him it difficult to arouse him. They told him they were editors, and wanted to hear him read before writing him up. They invited him to step into a hall adjoining the hotel and give them a specimen of his powers. At first the man refused to go with them, but when they told him clearly that they were editors, and would crush him if he did not comply, he felt compelled to go. Nor would they allow him to put on his clothes, but forced him to go in night-dress to a cold and dreary hall, where they complacently smoked their cigars while they listened to him declaim, with chattering teeth and trembling voice, for several hours. When they finally permitted him to go, they told him, by way of consolation, that they had always thirsted to hear a dramatic reader in night-dress, and that they were very much gratified with his performance.

Browne was a great lover of a practical joke. One of his maddest pranks was in New York City, in 1863. He had been a great scorer at the celebrated Dan Bryant and Nelse Seymour, and as its conclusion he induced these two to join him on a lark. Accordingly, they went to Bryant's property-room, and each donned a complete suit of armor. Then they armed themselves with broadswords, and in the still hours of the night went forth in search of defenseless citizens. Up and down the streets in grim array they marched, and, wherever they found a man alone and unarmed, they would make him down on his knees and pray for mercy. Then, after having inflicted him almost out of his senses, they would permit him to go on his way. Their fun, however, after a while, was brought to an abrupt termination by the police, who marched them off to the Tombs. They entered fictitious names, but the Judge next morning recognized the culprits, and discharged them with an admonition. On the same night they visited the house of Tom Jackson, who had just brought to this country the famous Swiss bell-ringers. In response to their violent ringing of the bell, Jackson came to an upper window, and, not knowing who his visitors were, asked them in tones of thunder what they wanted.

"We want an engagement," said Browne. "We are the original bell-ringers."

Scene at an Italian Court-Martial.

The reader must accompany me to Genoa, to the military tribunal there. On the bench of the accused sits a private soldier, Paolini by name, just let out of solitary confinement in the prisons at Savona. The first one, it seems, to which he put his freedom was to invent a reprimand from the Corporal, and so hurl a volley of insulting epithets at him and the superior officers. Among the witnesses for the defense is one Oreste Marisui, another jail-bird set at liberty from Savona. He, too, is a private soldier, twenty-five years of age; while a "local" witness, or witness for the prosecution, is Corporal Canzanigo, employed under the Governor of the prison—the same Corporal, in fact, whom the accused had insulted.

The court had just withdrawn to hold a consultation when Corporal Canzanigo happened to walk past the witness Marisui. This fellow, armed with an awl which he had contrived to conceal slung it by a piece of thread round the Corporal and dealt him three wounds in rapid succession. Soldiers, subalterns and officers at once surrounded the unarmed assailant and dragged him to the guard-room, where he was pinioned. Meanwhile the wounds he had inflicted on the Corporal were found to be serious, particularly one between the tenth and eleventh ribs. The weapon with which they were dealt was arched form the prisoner, but without success, till it was found sticking under a bench in the guard-room where he was secured.

During all this tumult the accused Paolini had gradually sidled up to the bench. One of these, a Captain, seeing him so near, and suspecting him of some sinister purpose, told him to undo his clothes and show he had no weapon concealed about him. None was found, and the Captain bade him take off his shoes. The fellow demurred. The Captain insisted, till with much needless delay Paolini slipped off one shoe, and, holding it by the tip, struck the Captain a violent blow in the face with the heel. The officer fell stunned. At this point the excitement and confusion became indescribable. The awl, the tallow, which will occupy the whole of the ensuing winter and spring, was in active commission.

The balloon will be the largest in the world. It will average about ninety feet in diameter and 175 in circumference, with a capacity for holding between 300,000 and 400,000 feet of gas. The material employed will be Pongee silk of a special manufacture, coated with a substance known only to the professor. The silk will be doubled throughout. Pure hydrogen gas will be used, and the cost of inflation alone is approximated at $6,000. The car will be a combination of boat and basket, a wicker framework covered with a heavy rubber substance, which can easily be used as a boat in case of emergency.

I shall positively start early in June," said the Professor last night. "I consider that the month with thunder-storms, which I do not wish to encounter, is the least frequent. The starting-point will be either New York or Brooklyn. I propose to keep in the lower currents, and to maintain a permanent altitude of 500 feet above the surface of the water. I shall entirely discard the old theory of sailing in currents from east to west as a principle of three miles. When you reach that height the gas begins to lose by expansion and heat. Then, further, begin to ascend, ballast must be thrown out. You rise again, more gas is lost; another descent, another throwing overboard of ballast; and so on until all your ballast is gone, and then you come down for good. Under my scheme I expect to be able to keep in the air for two months, if necessary, while there has never been a balloon which has kept distended from two weeks for a longer period than twenty-four hours."

"What period of time do you anticipate the trans-Atlantic voyage will occupy?"

"That is hard to say, but I expect to make at least twenty miles an hour, in addition to the ballast, the balloon will carry a large, heavy rope, which will drag the water. This will have a tendency to keep us in the permanent altitude of which I have spoken."—Philadelphia Record.

"You want to brake on this road, do you? Well, you can sit down there. We have no vacancy just at present, but we kill about two brakemen a day; and I dare say in a few minutes I shall hear of some one losing an arm or a leg, and then you can have the job." The man thought he would not wait.

A Sharp Trick by Two Tramps.

Flood and Bruce are peripatetic printers, widely known. They have a habit of turning up here and elsewhere when least expected, couling without warning and departing even as the wind. By a rare chance they have just been heard from at Danville, Ill., tramping from St. Louis, and headed in this direction. They came within view of that city last Sunday, weary with travel and sorely hungered. The road they came has been overworked. The erstwhile prosperous farmer now sets his dog on the wayfaring man instead of welcoming him to his family. Through this departure from the customs of the fathers, they walked and ate not.

Thoroughly discouraged at their repeated failures to procure food, they yet completed to make one more trial on this beautiful Sunday morning, and cautiously entered the yard of a decent farm-house, peering about them to see that Towser did not come suddenly around a corner. They knocked on the front door; no response. At the side door; no answer. They went in. There was not a soul at home. A table spread and a most substantial meal was before them. It was like a dream from the Arabian nights. The dinner was, doubtless, awaiting the return of the family from church. The pedestrians fell to, and their knives and forks soon smoked with the friction of execution. To say that they fared sumptuously would convey no idea of the amount they ate nor the intense satisfaction with which the viands were received.

As they were finishing the feast a knock was heard. Bruce, with unparalleled cheek, went to the door. There stood two other tramps, who asked for something to eat. Bruce, in a rare spirit of mischief, questioned them closely in regard to their travels, and finally asked if they would chop wood for their dinners. They answered yes. He then took them to a wood-pile that he had noticed in the rear of the house, and they went to work. Bruce and Flood, filling their pockets with victuals, stole out the side way from the house and went to a neighboring hill, where they had a full view of the wood-pile and the toiling tramps. There they gloated over the picture. To make their pleasure still more complete, the owner of the farmhouse with several daughters and two stalwart sons arrived on the scene, the devastation of the dinner was discovered, and the two sweating tramps at the wood-pile seized as the depredators. All was seen by the two on the hill, from the arrival of the family to the ignominious expulsion of the wood-cutters.—Indianapolis News.

Death in the Oil-Can.

A man out on South Hill had reason to believe that his Superintendent of Cuisine was in the habit of using incense to start the morning fires. He placed his suspicions in the form of a charge, which was indignantly denied, and proof demanded. He wasn't armed with his testimony, and the case was dismissed for lack of evidence. But his suspicions increased, and he secured a secret investigation, and appointed himself Chairman of the committee, with power to send for persons and papers. He laid his plans with care, and the next morning he followed his maid-servant down stairs at a careful and respectful distance, and hid himself near the kitchen door, where he could not see nor be seen, while he could hear every distinct whisper or wag said or done. The rustle of paper and the rattle of dry light wood was succeeded by hasty steps toward the closet in the cellar-way. Then he heard the gurgling of a liquid, as though it was bubbling out of a small tin spout. He heard the can set down and then the scrape of a match.

"Hi'm," he heard the maid-servant remark. Then another match snapped and a barely audible fizzle succeeded. Grimly smiled the silent man by the outer door.

"Hi'm," remarked the maid-servant, a little petulantly. Another match snapped and blazed up. Another sound as of sizzling. The smile on the face of the man deepened into a grin.

"Well, I never did," came from the kitchen, and there was heard the sound of more pouring on the light wood. Another match and more silence.

"Well, did you ever?" queried the queen of the range, evidently anxious to obtain testimony corroborative of her own experience, as set forth in her previous statement that she never did. The man sitting outside the door throttled himself with both hands and softly pounded the ground with his heels. Something evidently excited him, and when the next match snapped he caught himself by the legs and bit fiercely into the corner of the door-frame in a frenzied effort to smother a hollow groan.

"The old Scratch is in the oil, I do believe," said a troubled voice in the kitchen, and more pouring ensued. Another match, another, another. And the man crawled off behind the cistern-box and hugged his knees with many insane expressions and silent demonstrations of interest, when he heard the angry voice inside the kitchen say:

"Plague on such oil! I'd like to pour it all down Will Darling's back!"

Another match, and then a confused sound of rattling and scraping, and a tearful woman came to the door and hurled an armful of soaked paper and light wood out into the yard and kicked an oil-can after it. The smiling man crept back up stairs unseen. Breakfast was late that morning, and when the queen of the kitchen was asked the cause wherefore, she said somebody had left the shed door open and all the light wood was damp. And no man that ever filled an oil-can with non-explosive cistern water ever looked half so suggestive as the man who sat at the head of that table choking over a graham muffin.—Burlington Hawk-Eye.

Rose-Tinted Teeth.

JAPANESE women color their teeth coal black, and the fashionable ladies of New York have now announced dying their's in a delicate rose-colored tint. A reporter of the Mercury, having learned that a dentist on Madison avenue was engaged in gratifying this latest freak of New York fashion, interviewed him on the subject, when the following conversation ensued:

"You are engaged in coloring ladies' teeth light red, I understand," said the reporter. "What has caused this strange idea?" "I could not tell you that. I am ashamed of dabbling in this sort of business (and you mustn't mention my name); but my best female clients have called upon me for it, and of course I could not refuse them. Though I explained to them the danger, invariably the custom of coloring woman's teeth red comes, so far as I know, from China. Only ladies of the highest distinction there indulge in it, and I believe it is a mark of the most aristocratic class. The lower classes of women have dye their teeth bright yellow or dark red. Who imported the fashion here I do not know; but a gentleman who is engaged in business at Shanghai is selling the dyeing substance here. That substance is extremely expensive; so dear, in fact, that only ladies of wealth are able to purchase it."

"But what is the object of this dyeing process? It must make the teeth look repulsive." "Not when the ladies who have irregular teeth look more attractive after the dye has been applied. They have to put another substance on their lips to make them look as pale as possible. You know that lip-coloring has been going on among women for many years past. Then came the enameling of the teeth, which was a precarious and mostly unsuccessful process. Besides, it injured the teeth invariably, and there being arsenic in the enameling substance, it was quite dangerous to apply."

"There is no danger, then, in the rose-tinting substance?" "To tell you the truth, there must be. What the Chinese do to make it so I know, but a chemist tells me that there must be aniline in it. Of course we do not want it to be analyzed, for that would, in all probability, establish the fact that it could be produced for a few cents. It would injure our business, and popularize the application of the substance among certain classes of women, while it is now confined to the best classes of society. The other day a gentleman came to me quite excitedly and said to me: 'What business has you to color my wife's teeth so horrible?' 'Well, she wanted it,' I replied. 'But do you know that one-half her teeth are broken off in consequence and that she has made me quite sick,' rejoined the irate husband. That caused me to investigate the matter, and I took an artificial set of teeth and applied the dyeing substance to it. The teeth were so thinly set that it would ordinarily take a great effort to break them out. The substance colored them delicately red, and I then tried to break them off. They had become as little as gingerbread. Let me repeat the experiment.

He produced a small vial containing a entirely colorless fluid. Dropping a very little of it on a sponge, he rubbed it half a dozen times over an ivory set of teeth. In five minutes the white color of the teeth had changed to a beautiful rose tint. Then he handed the set to the reporter and asked him to break off the teeth. They went off immediately, and without the slightest effort on the part of the reporter. The latter asked to be shown the vial containing the fluid. A very strong but by no means unpleasant odor emanated from it. "This two-ounce vial costs me $100," said the dentist.

"What do you charge for an application of the dying substance?" asked the reporter. The dentist evaded answering the question. "I charge for each an application in proportion to the price of the substance," he said. "And the finer substance, by which the lips are whitened, what does it cost?" "Oh, that costs little or nothing. Common white lead, wash, or pearl white or rice powder will do for that purpose, if properly applied."

"Are many dentists engaged in this business?" "No, I know of only five, and only one of them, as I can swear, uses not the genuine substance, but an aniline preparation, which must be very poisonous."

"Have you many applications by ladies desirous of having their teeth colored red?"

"A great many. You have noticed my sign? I have put upon it the words: 'Uses the rose-tinged ivy.' Fashionable ladies, seeing that, come in, and want to know the price of the application. Most of them leave very abruptly when they hear how expensive it is. But enough pay the price decently well in consequence the dentists will soon have an increased demand for false teeth."

"How long will the dye produce its effects. Will not the color fade very soon?"

"No, it will not fade at all. If the dye did not affect the teeth must injuriously it would last for years. But in six months the teeth thus colored will be refixed."

Or CHILLS and FEVER.

The proprietor of this celebrated medicine justly claims for it a superiority over all remedies ever offered to the public by the SAFE, CERTAIN, SPEEDY and PERMANENT cure of Ague and Fever, or Chills and Fever, whether of short or long standing. Readers to the entire Western and Southern country to bear him testimony to the truth of the assertion that in no case whatever will it fail to cure if the directions are strictly followed and carried out. In a great many cases a single dose has been sufficient for a cure, and whole families have been cured by a single bottle, with a perfect restoration of the general health. It is, however, prudent, and in every case more certain to cure, if its use is continued in smaller doses for a week or two after the disease has been checked, more especially in difficult and long-standing cases. Usually this medicine will not require any aid to keep the bowels in good order. Should the patient, however, require a cathartic medicine, after having taken three or four doses of the Tonic, a single dose of BULL'S VEGETABLE FAMILY PILLS will be sufficient.

The genuine SMITH'S TONIC SYRUP must have DR. JOHN BULL'S name blown in the bottle, DR. JOHN BULL only has the right to manufacture it, and has the original JOHN J. SMITH'S TONIC SYRUP.

Examine well the label on each bottle. If any private stamps are found on the bottle, do not purchase, or you will be deceived.

ADDITIONAL LOCAL.

We made a flying trip up the State road south of this place Friday, and were pleased to note the improvements being made by the farmers along the road. In the Barnard neighborhood Andrew Mudge and Henry Harkness are building new houses, Robert Trimble is building a large granary, and Isaac Ager is putting up a good barn. All this denotes thrift and industry.

NARROW ESCAPE.—Richard Cooper, of this village, narrowly escaped drowning, on Saturday morning. The propeller Fountain City was making a landing, and Mr. Cooper was taking her line across the dock, when a loose plank gave way and precipitated him together with a young brother of F. J. Meech into the lake. He went down but came to the surface and grasped a slippery pile, but his extreme weight overcame him and he was gradually sinking. Young Meech held Cooper up until help came. He gave up, and bade everybody good bye three times before being rescued. It is considered by all who were present as a most miraculous escape.

DARING BURGLARY.—A most daring burglary was committed on the propeller Gazelle, in this village, on Thursday evening. The steamer arrived down the lake after dark, and the boys made her fast to the dock and went to supper. In their absence some unknown person entered through the window of the water-closet, pried open the cover to the Captain's secretary, in the cabin, and took an amount of money, supposed to be in the neighborhood of $50. No clue to the thief.

THE Ladies' Aid Society have decided to purchase an organ for the M. E. Church. To this end they will hold a "Mum Social" at the residence of Hon. E. H. Green next Wednesday evening. Both mums and anti mums are cordially invited to be present. Mum babies at half prices. The unique spectacle of a lady who will remain silent for the space of two minutes will be presented. Let everybody forget finances and the question of the campaign and give the ladies a helping hand.

THE political outlook in Charlevoix county is very encouraging for the Republicans, and especially for the Republican county ticket. The greenback excitement in this county has reached the maximum of its intensity, and is diminishing. Almost daily we are informed of the return of prodigal Republicans to their first love, and extreaming weariness of hearing the visionary and contradictory speeches of the greenback-socialist office-seekers. Many say the sudden "flop" of the chief orator (?) of the "fatists" from the Republican party into the arms of the greenbackers was not made quick enough. In fact they say it is "too thin." The Republican county ticket will be elected by a majority far greater than is hoped for the State ticket. The only way the Greenbackers can gain votes in Charlevoix county now is to hurry up the election.

P. B. WACHTEL & CO., Bankers, Petoskey, Mich, invite the attention of the public generally to the banking facilities offered for Northern Michigan. Foreign and domestic exchange bought and sold. 29 4t

A telegram Saturday to Byron See, of this place, from Milwaukee, announced that his wife had undergone a successful operation upon her eyes and was doing well. Mrs See has been in Milwaukee for some time under the treatment of a skilful oculist.

THE SCHOOL.—On Wednesday, in company with Hon. E. H. Green, we visited our village school, we found the attendance good, and the school prosperous. Prof. Mayne demonstrates an aptness in his teaching which must prove satisfactory to the District if the school does its part. Mr. Green is an old teacher and a competent judge, and he was highly pleased with his style of teaching. Miss Alsslie's department is also progressing nicely, and everything seems to be satisfactory. If the present status of the school be any evidence, the patrons may rest assured that their children are in good hands.

Irredeemable fiat paper, not backed by a promise to pay in coin, must inevitably be worthless. No man or government has power or ingenuity to make such paper valuable.

The Elections.

Greenbackers Nowhere!

Let every Republican rejoice! The result of Tuesdays elections are of a character greatly to encourage the friends of Republicanism and honest finance. The State of Ohio, which last year gave a Democratic majority of 20,520, is redeemed, and now stand securely in the Republican column, by a majority of 10,000.

The Republicans of Iowa elect the State ticket by over 20,000 majority, which is a gain over last year of over 20,000, when the Republicans had only a plurality on the vote for Governor.

Perhaps the most remarkable feature of the election is the insignificant figure cut by the "National" party in Ohio, where they bragged and boasted so loudly, their vote is reported as not largely exceeding that of last year—about 20,000 in a total of 555,009. In the other States their vote is scarcely mentioned.

A recent telegram from Washington states that a Mrs. Cassidy, whose husband is an employ on the B. & O. R. R., living between Washington and Blandensburg, has just given birth to five children, three girls and two boys, and all of them remarkable well. They are very small but perfect in their organism and may live. The mother is out of danger and able to receive the congratulations of her friends.

It is estimated that from two to three hundred millions of capital are lying idle in this country, and the Greenback party is mainly responsible for the state of affairs.

The sooner the Greenback Communist party goes out of existence, the sooner hoarded capital will be unlocked and the hum of the busy wheel of industry be heard all over the land.

Capital cannot be bought out of its hiding places by threatening it, any more than a squirrel can be coaxed out of a hole in a tree by threatening to meet him with clubs, dogs and guns.

Capitalists are not going to lend good money to receive their pay in irredeemable fiat trash. If capital cannot have proper protection in this country it will naturally go to some other, where fiat money schemes have no support.

A Remarkable Result.

It makes no difference how many Physicians, or how much medicine you have tried, it is now an estimated fact that German Syrup is the only remedy which has given complete satisfaction in severe cases of Lung Diseases. It is true there are yet thousands of persons who are predisposed to Throat and Lung Affections, Consumption, Hemorrhages, Asthma, Severe Colds settled on the Breast, Pneumonia, Whooping Cough, &c., who have no personal knowledge of Boschee's German Syrup. To such we would say that 50,000 dozen were sold last year without one complaint. Consumptives try just one bottle. Regular size 75 cents. Sold by your Druggist, Geo. W. CROUTER.

An Astonishing Fact.

A large proportion of the American people are to-day dying from the effects of Dyspepsia or disordered liver. The result of these diseases upon the masses of intelligent and valuable people is most alarming, making life actually a burden instead of a pleasant existence of enjoyment and usefulness as it ought to be. There is no good reason for this. If you will only throw aside prejudice and skepticism, take the advice of your Druggist, Geo. W. Crouter, and your friends, and try one bottle of Green's August Flower. Your speedy relief is certain. Millions of bottles of this medicine have been given away to try its virtues, with satisfactory results in every case. You can buy a Sample Bottle for 10 cents to try. Three doses will relieve the worst case. Positively sold by all Druggists on the Western Continent.

MONEY TO LOAN, on good real estate security. Inquire of A. R. Upright, Charlevoix, Mich. 16-1yr

WHAT better evidence is there of the thrift and growth of Charlevoix than that every carpenter and builder has plenty of work at good wages.

The Board of Supervisors and the Bridge.

The Board of Supervisors at their Annual session last week self-praised without making provisions for the payment of the bridge bonds which become due next spring. They also passed a resolution submitting the bridge question to a vote of the people at the spring election, and instructed the Co. Treasurer not to pay any of said bonds until they were ratified by the people.

This action on the part of the Board is enigmatical. Just what is to be gained by this procedure is not discloced by the record, nor by any member of the Board.

The Board of Supervisors at their Annual session in October, 1877, voted a sum of money, to be expended in constructing a bridge across Pine River, in the Township of Charlevoix, in consideration of Charlevoix Township assuming independently an additional share of the burden. Charlevoix performed her part of the compact, and under the provisions of the resolution of the Board, the County Treasurer issued and negotiated the bonds, the bridge already having been built.

Now although the Attorney General of the State of Michigan pronounced these proceedings in accordance with law, we can throw the legal aspects of the case aside, and yet fail to discover wherein lies the policy or economy of this attempted repudiation by the Board at their last session.

Whatever may be the result of the vote on the question, its effect will be like that of the snow which smothered up the hill and then marched down again. If the people vote to sustain the action of the Board in voting the money, it will not strengthen their action. If the opposite is the result, it will not undo their action, nor destroy the bonds.

But the last action of the Board will have this effect. It will impair the credit of Charlevoix county in all future transactions where credit is sought. A burnt child shuns the fire.

The Legislature of Charlevoix county authorized the building of the bridge, and it was built. Legal or illegal, the bonds must be paid by somebody, and that somebody will be Charlevoix county, even if it be with a taxed bill of costs levied against the Co. Treasurer in the Circuit Court.

Charlevoix Township stands nobly up and bears double its proportion of the burden; and when in the near future the people of the whole county will be called upon to improve its internal navigation principally for the benefit of the eastern portion of the county, again Charlevoix Township will stand nobly up and do her full share. We are sorry that a broader and more generous view is not taken of these questions.

THE extreme length of the proceedings of the Board of Supervisors, and the short time left to set them up, forces us to defer their publication another week.

Why don't our preacher return and extricate Charlevoix from the slough of wickedness and despond incident to the stove-pipe season? The fate of Sodom and—and—Gemina will be ours if this think is not stopped!

OUR statement last week that "Greenback speeches and whiskey would not do it in Charlevoix county," has been subcontracted by some. We meant to convey the idea that the speeches and whiskey went together in the interest of a spot in the greenback county ticket pretty near the top end. If any are in doubt as to the meaning of this, there are two more issues before election in which to make it plainer.

SIX years ago the Board of Supervisors of Charlevoix county illegally appropriated $1,000 for the improvement of the upper river. The work was done, an interest bearing bond issued and paid without a growl from Charlevoix Township! Who received the benefit from this? Why didn't Charlevoix "injunct" and raise the d—l generally? Say!

They had been joined by many of spotted Tail's renegades, and it was thought the runaway Cheyennes from the South intended to join them. YELLOW-FEVER NEWS.

A. D. LANGSTAFF, President of the Howard Association at Memphis, issued a warning, on the 4th, to refugees, cautioning them against their coming to that city until it should be safer for them to go. NEWS was received from Memphis, on the 5th, that the fever had appeared at every point on the line of the Memphis & Charleston Road, and as far as Chattanooga, Tenn., and the effect had been to create a stampede at each of the small towns where even one case of the disease developed itself. There were seventy-three deaths in Memphis, and twelve in the suburbs, during the twenty-four hours ending at six p. m., on the 6th. Nurses were being sent to the smaller towns where needed.

THE Connecticut town elections occurred on the 7th. The returns received at Hartford, up to the morning of the 8th, were meager, but indicated Republican gains. The Democratic vote in Hartford assessors who stood 4,725 for the Democratic and elected a majority of the town officer.

A Durable Garment.

AN agricultural society of Herefordshire, Eng., declined to admit to its exhibition a pair of jet sheep with white faces and black wool, and gave as the reason for rejection the assertion that "the introduction of black sheep would reduce the value of wool." It is certain that black wool is considered less valuable than pure white, and the animal that bears it is usually deemed the disreputable one of the flock—what in society is denominated "a black sheep." To demonstrate that the popular estimation is wrong, and that black wool is fully as serviceable as white—in fact, better for certain purposes—the editor of the Chemistry Journal gives the following interesting account of a humble garment:

"About twenty years ago, we took a fancy to have an 'Inverness Cape,' a kind of cloak much loose covers for the arms, made from the fleeces of two black-wooded sheep, which browsed daily amidst a flock under our windows. We were determined to see how the manufacture of the wool in its purely natural state would turn out. Accordingly, the fleeces were shorn, washed, carded, spun, woven by a handloom weaver in our neighborhood, and finally made by a tailor into the required garment. Since that time we have worn it every winter, and as it wraps it always accompanies us on our travels. Indeed, it is the cape of the coldest weather. The color is brown, and as bright as the day it was first worn. It cleans, we find, as might be the case with wool the fleeces of which are inherent in the substance of the wool; and fifty years hence, if kept so long, it would still be undecayed. After making the cloak, there was cloth left sufficient for a lady's jacket, and it has worn equally well. In the caprices of fashion, gentlemen are fond of dressing in rough tweeds, the coarser seemingly the better. We have described a tweed, to call it so, which would undergo any amount of exposure to the atmosphere, and never alter in its original shape, even if it should worn to be threadbare.—*N. Y. The Chicago Inter-State Exposition.

Among the notable exhibits at the Exposition now in full flow of successful progress, is the booth of J. & P. COATS, the celebrated Thread Manufacturers, who have made their name a household word for the last half century. Their six-cord spool cotton, in its strength, is said to be unsurpassed. Of its excellence it is made in every conceivable color, coarse enough for sewing carpets, and fine and ornamental purpose, and has long been a favorite with the ladies. It has been awarded by the great Expositions in this country and Europe—at the London in 1862; Paris, 1867; Vienna, 1873; Centennial at Philadelphia, 1876. At each of these it secured a medal for its excellence, and finally was awarded a diploma at the Centennial was given in the following language: "Superior strength, fine finish, smoothness and excellent quality of spool cotton." This award was given by the Commissioners of the United States Centennial Commission, A. T. GOODRICH, Director-General.

The New York AGENTS, Messrs. Anchinclos Bros., have just received a cable telegram announcing the fact that Messrs. J. & P. Coats have awarded the gold medal for their spool cotton by the judges at the Paris Exhibition.

The factories of the firm are established in Pawtucket, in this country, where they employ an army of several hundred hands, and in Paisley, Scotland, where Sir Peter Coats, the head of the firm and family resides, and is widely known for his generous philanthropies. Queen Victoria acknowledged by knighting him a few years ago. Only a short time ago he was an honored guest in Chicago, and his courtesy and affability won many friends. It has always been the effort of this firm to secure accuracy in measuring its, and it has been in that way that they have secured such an enviable reputation for the articles they manufacture. The best goods can be made only out of the best material, and, knowing this, the Messrs. Coats use the best Sea Island cotton for their thread. This and the care exercised in its manufacture, is what renders "Coats' Spool Cotton" the favorite with the matrons of this country, and enables them to retain their trade against all competition.

"HOW LONG are you going to stay here?" "Why, my little man?" "'Cause I'm hungry, and mamma says we shall have dinner as soon as that dreadful nuisance goes away."

BABY'S BIRTHDAY.

Hidden threshold, leading outward to a world so strange and wide,
Looking through the small Present, to a Future all unfried!

Are there thorns among the blossoms? Are there snares that we do not know?
Ah, fair soul, that hides its Future! God's Eyes looking out alone how!

Close about the shining threshold cluster loves of many years;
As they watch the young life budding—here the ray, and there the fears.

Baby-faith, reach down and help us, since we cannot reach to you!
Teach us how to look for Heaven that is nearer So our love shall rest serenely in the One Love strong and true!

—Harper's Bazar, in N. Y. Observer.

THE LIGHTNING-ROD MAN.

A melancholy farmer, high disease,
Who sold all his property and went to sea,
Wanted no food or drink but tea,
And all the while the bad boys crept
Almost to perhaps, where they ate
Enough to kill ten men, but failed
To make the melancholy farmer sick.
This rendered farmer, high disease,
Who watched and watched, but all in vain,
The boys ripened his soul and bore stalks
Almost the awful time there had
Upon the farmer with a nail,
And bored for a lightning rod.

Next morning, sir," he sweetly spoke,
"My lightning rod you'll notice has
They are the last; just let me make—"
But the farmer only said,
"O, spare your rods," the farmer said,
And aimed the gun straight at his head.
The boards flattened at his feet;
He packed his valise with unwilling tweed,
Descended it; he ne'er was seen.

Now, farmer," said he, oh, so sleek,
"And learn a call, then you may wreck
Your vengeance on the other cheek."

A GAMBLER'S STORY.

How He Brought Himself and Family to Ruin and Woe.

Gambling, as it exists in St. Louis, has many phases and many bearings. It involves the men who keep the houses, the men who play there to play and the officials who protect it and allow it to prosper. Those who suffer are the players and those dependent on them. The proprietors reap the first profit, the officials—well, this is rather a delicate matter. It is intended that nothing shall appear in this publication, nor extravagantly sentimental shall appear in the Post's articles on gambling. It is a grave subject, and they shall handle it with the utmost delicacy. But it is intended that every hideous feature of it shall be presented in Pawnbroker, in this country, where they are established in the foot of Broadway, and at the Paris Exhibition.

The factories of the firm are established in Pawnbroker, in this country, where they employ an army of several hundred hands, and in Paisley, Scotland, where Sir Peter Coats, the head of the firm and family resides, and is widely known for his generous philanthropies. Queen Victoria acknowledged by knighting him a few years ago. Only a short time ago he was an honored guest in Chicago, and his courtesy and affability won many friends. OUR RADIX LETTER.

A great deal has been said and written about the overcrowding of the public school buildings in this city, by some of which as many as 4000 more than the proper number are daily received. This practice, besides seriously affecting the health of the children, will some day be the cause of a serious calamity if not stopped. It came near doing so within the last ten days. In one of the up town schools, containing nearly 2,500 pupils, a little girl was taken with convulsions, and just before losing consciousness she called out the name of her teacher, a Miss Fay. The name was misunderstood by some of the other scholars in the room for a cry of "Fire!" which they at once took up and began to run out into the hall. Their cries soon penetrated adjoining rooms, and the panic spread like wildfire. Luckily, the first children who got out of the building and ran up the street still shouting "Fire!" were noticed by the police at a neighboring station, and twenty blue coats hurried to the building and stopped the egress of the frightened throng. Up the staircases and on the corridors above the craziest confusion prevailed, and in the class rooms the children clambered over desks and over one another in their efforts to get out. The older teachers were doing all in their power to allay the fears of their pupils, but to no purpose. Police Captain Ward lodged his whistle and called the children to their rooms. At first they were reluctant to obey. The most serious objections was made by the older pupils, who implored him to let them out of the building. The Captain was inflexible, however, and backed by his twenty officers was finally obeyed.

In the meantime, however, the rumor that the grammar school was on fire reached the homes of the children, and frantic mothers left their different occupations and hurried over. Before many minutes had passed the street from Eighth to Ninth Avenue was crowded with excited women. Captain Ward appeared on the steps of the building and assured them that every one was safe. But they would not believe him, and each insisted on entering and satisfying herself by ocular demonstration of the safety of her offspring. Thus the Captain refused to permit, knowing that it would only revive the confusion and disturb the exercises of the school. Most of the women then went home, but many remained who would not be convinced that the children were safe and sound. At twelve o'clock school was dismissed for recess, and the little ones as they emerged were picked up by their mothers and hugged as though the latter had never before realized how dear to them the little ones were.

The injuries resulting from this panic were miraculously few, which is partially accounted for by the fact that the rush was comparatively on the general floor, and did not reach the top stories. But the accident occurred to prepare every child the Union certainly avoided the hooting, the thumping of the ever crowded stairways must have resulted in terrible disaster.

One of the Inman steamers, the "City of Chester," which recently arrived in this port was found on inspecting to contain in its hold a young stowaway who had never ventured on the vessel was about into Liverpool, to steal a passage to this country. Searcher to make his appearance when it should be too late to put him ashore. In searching however, he took up his quarters in a part of the boat from which after the cargo was stowed and the hatches battened, there was no possible escape. In this dreadful predicament, therefore, the poor fellow remained for the whole eleven days of the voyage without food or water, and when found was nearly dead. Thanks to prompt attention and careful nursing he is in a fair way to recover. Besides this one the "City of Chester" brought over two other stowaways, who had evaded the vigilance of the officers, and these were until Friday last, only upon search which they asked by a paper which can be seen at the office. The latter confessed them to avoid and the latter did at work aboard a coal sweeping.

Harper's Weekly in the last issue has a cleverly drawn cartoon representing Peter Cooper crowning Butler with the silk cushion the former always carries with him to bridge over any hard seat he may come across in his lecture or social travels. The former is dressed in the costume of a Greek philosopher, and is investing the latter with a wreath of laurel. Cooper ridiculed. Every one has long made up for the good nature of this gentleman in permitting him to appear in public with his exceedingly ridiculous and ill-fitting clothes, but the latest picture of B. is the most unkind cut of all. Cooper ridiculed. Every one has long made up for the good nature of this gentleman in permitting him to appear in public with his exceedingly ridiculous and ill-fitting clothes, but the latest picture of B. is the most unkind cut of all.

Some "reformers" are talking about low rates of interest as if they should not be higher than the average gain of property or wealth. But would you have a flock of lambs or flock for a farm or any such case? Would you loose ten acres to be tossed to wheat for three years out, or the crop. Why do men borrow money? Do they borrow it for purposes where they do not expect to make more than three or five or seven per cent profit? Not at all. They hire money from a profitable use is what a low rate of interest is.

When our National bank system was established, the old State banks subsided, and from that day to this no human being ever lost a dollar by taking the currency issued by any National bank. The note of any bank is good in Maine or Louisiana, and passing as the holder assumes both a genuine note, he does not care what bank issued it, or where it is located. With out banking disappears lumber that have sent the cells of worthless currency were known no more. Nor is there any monopoly in the banking business. Banking is now free to all men, without regard to race or color—all that is required is that a corporation should be formed and a certain amount of capital furnished.

The point so clearly shown by Secretary Schurz in his recent speech at Cincinnati, that there was no contraction of the currency, but positive inflation, for the five years preceding the panic of 1873, can not be too often presented. There is a good opinion on the currency between the years 1865 and 1868 that we quote from the result. Contraction was begun in 1868, and in 1869 the amount of paper currency outstanding was $765,795,000.00. In 1870 it was $780,376,679.48; in 1871 it was $741,853,751.06; in 1872 it was $738,370,993.32; in 1873 it was $750,002,368.94—that is, the volume had increased over $45,000,000. And yet, on the top of the succeeding series, came the panic, with all its terrible consequences. Thus, it appears that years of prosperity followed contraction, and general stagnation followed expansion. Even after the panic began $41,000,000 was added to the currency without in the least checking its evils.

Some fellow-mortal has stolen about ten dollars worth of property from Wm. Bennett, of Norwich, Conn., and the latter has offered a reward of $100 for the apprehension of the thief. Bennett is a poor man, and the reward is a large one for him to offer. The thief, if he has any conscience left, must feel pretty mean.

A Galician woman lost a bag of gold coin and other articles, supposed to have been buried ever since the days of Lycurgus, 600 years before the Christian era. The weight of the treasure makes it of the intrinsic value of about $30,000 or, not to fatigue the reader.

Colorado is entitled to a seat in the House and Senate as any part of the country. They know the difference between a Democratic majority in the House and a Republican majority in the Senate. Colorado gave a majority of 3,000 in favor of Democracy, and a total vote of about 40,000, as large in proportion as a majority of 30,000 in Michigan.

It is not true that inflation brings better wages to the laboring men. In our cities are not enormously better wages to-day than the average pay of skilled labor in the country was $9.84 a week. In 1860, when the currency was inflated to the highest point, and gold was at a premium, the average pay was $10.97 a week. Hence, the inflation of currency did not increase the power of labor to buy. Honest money, of course, should be the work of honest men.

—Mrs. Spofford, who presided over the Butler Convention, in Worcester, is the husband of Harriet Prescott Spofford the writer.

—Jonny G. Whittier says that Ralph Waldo Emerson is the one American who is sure of being remembered a thousand years.

—Miss Livermore had the rare honor on her return from Europe of being welcomed to her home in Melrose by the local authorities and the people in general.

—Mrs. Anna Maria Rowley, the eldest daughter and last surviving child of Leigh Hunt's commentator, Dr. Adam Clarke, has just died, at the age of eighty-five.

—Mrs. W. S. Jackson, of Colorado (nee Helen Hunt), who wrote poems under the signature of "H. H.," is now fair, forty and stout, and has been twice married. She was a New Englander by birth.

—The following curious document was produced in a New York Court, a few days ago, in an abandonment case:

"This is to certify that I Frank Keebler give up all claims to Kate Kocher on account I can not live at Dolton and give up all claims as her husband so she can marry again or be single.

Witness, [Name illegible.]
Kate Kocher."

—Mrs. Julia C. R. Dorr, of Vermont, has received the personal thanks of King Alfonso of Spain for her sonnet on the Queen Mercedes, which appeared in Scribner's Monthly, and was translated into Spanish by order of the Spanish Minister at Washington.

—William E. Wilcutt, for four years editor of the Springfield Republican, has left his situation and will study for the ministry. And a Texas editor has been arrested for misappropriating a neighboring hog with a horse at one end. Reckless, this seems to be a bad year for editors.—Norristown Herald.

—Edwin Prench, the aged and respected citizen of Ohio, whose body was stolen from the grave ten hours after burial by a medical college of Cleveland, "case," it is grimly added, a friend of the college, and had given it $100." That sum just about paid the cost of digging him up, but it was a mighty poke to play on him.—N. Y. Graphic.

—Senator Giles, of Virginia, and Judge Duval, of Maryland, boarded in Washington during Washington's administration, at the house of a Mrs. Gibbon, whose daughters were talkative and were not young. Some years after they met at the capital, and, while chatting over old times, the Senator asked the Judge, then Comptroller of the Treasury, if he knew what had become of "that cackling old maid, Miss Gibbon?" "She is Mrs. Duval, sir," was the reply.

Boys and Oxen.

An article on "The Boy on a Hill Farm," in Lippincott's Magazine, gives the following amusing description of the relations which exist between the hill farmer and the oxen on a New England farm:

The boy cannot conceive what poetry there is about oxen. From the moment of full tides in the bay with its mother's milk, and makes believe there is no such boy, until it becomes six or, it cannot for an instant be considered cruelty to a boy. The calf is a creature that insists, whenever it drinks, on thrusting its head to the bottom of the pail, with a splash that deluges the boy with milk; it drinks until it is out of breath, and then withdraws its head with another splash and an explosive snort of milk-steam from its nostrils—performances which excite the boy's friends to remark wherever he goes,

"You smell of sour milk." The boy likes to feed enough to feel the oxen their coarse meals; he likes to see them get down on their knees to lick up morsels that roll into corners of the stable floor; he dreams his hand into their mouths for little balls of meat they cannot reach with their long tongues, at which they draw back with a thwack against the stanchions; breathing hard and gazing at him with their large black eyes; and when the off ox tries to capture his night cap, the boy raps him back to his place. Quite a pastoral friendship exists between the boy and the night ox, which, being constantly bullied by the off ox, needs the boy's protection, and is therefore placed next him at work. But, for all that, he does not see the romance of such matters.

The yoking of oxen is decidedly not a matter for a little smile to a boy. He lays ox's end of the yoke's beam on the ground, lifts the other end with his right hand, and, waving one of the ox-bows in his left, cries to the nigh ox, "Gee over!" The "nigh" slowly obeys, bending its head low to accommodate the boy's stature, and permitting itself to be fastened by the ox-bow to the yoke. The boy now lifts the free end of the yoke's beam as high as he can and calls the off ox to come under. It also obeys, treading deliberately with its heavy feet, and waiting patiently for the boy's small fingers to fasten the yoke—s bow with a clumsy bow-key. Then the boy lifts the pole-ends cart-swap and stations it to the ring in the yoke—s labor that causes his heart to "bent like a tabor," and thus the beasts are coupled to their daily toil. Occasionally, however, the ox will not come under at all, but will require the boy to follow it about the barnyard, dragging the jingling yoke and waving the bow with infinite fatigue, and occasionally the lazy makes the mistake (no greater could be made) of yoking the off ox first. The off ox, finding a coke sans yokefellow dangling at its neck, is much amazed, not being "broke" to that, and takes to whirling round and round and galloping up and down the barnyard in a manner suggestive of nightmare. This is a circumstance that makes a boy hopeful of going somewhere else.

The yoking of oxen, though difficult, is nothing compared with the working of oxen. The boy can direct his plow lightly along in straight furrow, anticipating each movement of the oxen, and he can turn a corner "straight as a hog's leg;" nevertheless, he would like those persons who have a Woodstockian idea of following the plow along the mountain-side in glory and in joy to witness the struggles of a green hand learning to plow—of a tramp hird man, say, one of the sort that can't milk and don't know "haw" from "gee." This miserable being tires himself out doing nothing. He cannot lay a furrow over and downward; he has to stop and turn it over with his hands. He leaves patches of turf. He does not touch up his oxen scientifically, the "nigh" on the head, the "off" on the rump; therefore they frequently do not move at all. His plow-point hits the stones, and his plow-handles knock him in the ribs, and he turns out. If he is plowing near the barn, which is the home of the oxen, approaching it, they go like lightning, and he must drop the plow and rush at their heads to keep them from running straight into the barn; leaving it, they creep like snails, and perhaps they take to "pulling"—that is, walking sidewise, with their bodies as far apart as possible, or to "crowding"—leaning against each other over the chain that holds the plow to the yoke, and one of them gets its foot on the chain and proceeds on three feet. If the tramp hired-man goes between them to adjust the chain, the oxen squeeze him flat and one ox steps on his toe. The toe goes pop! and what anguish! The ox cannot be made to understand that it must step off. No use in saying "Higish!" or anything else. Nothing but kicking the ox in the leg with your free foot will suit it. In addition to these troubles of the ox-driver, the boy can know how to "turn the yoke;" they can twist their heads in the yoke after a fashion that enables them to gore the driver. If they "turn the yoke" while being accompanied by a parent or an elderly person, and so for bearding him, that is entirely out of the question, but hardly think they admire the independence of the American girls; especially those who venture to stay at home during the absence of the family. Four things! They knew not and they could not see the crown of glory on the dead child's brow—a crown whose light all the shadows of earth can never darken in the least.—Detroit Free Press.

A Woman's Life in Germany.

The German mother entrusts her children almost entirely to the nurse's arms. They spend the greater part of the time in the open air, the great place of resort here being the "Promenade," where from early morning until evening may be seen little children, ranging in age from those in "swaddling clothes" to those of six and seven years. They are encouraged and made to walk much earlier than American children, and it is, perhaps, owing to this that so many have crooked limbs; for in the short space of time I have been in this country I have seen more bow-legged men and crooked women than I ever saw in America. Theserants in charge are oftentimes more interested in the soldiers passing by than in the little ones entrusted to their care. At an early age they are placed in a "Kindergarten" school, and later, the child should need the gentler sex and of well-to-do parents, she is sent to a young ladies' seminary. Here she is instructed entirely in her own language but also in French, English and perhaps Italian; music, drawing and painting are not forgotten; great pains are taken to instruct her in English and German literature, while such matters as the sciences are neglected or soon dropped. Between the ages of fifteen and eighteen she is expected to be confirmed, and of course must, in some measure, prepare herself by studying the catechism, and purchasing a new white dress for the occasion. At this time they also receive presents from parents and friends; the former gift being generally a watch; this perhaps is an incentive to encourage them to be confirmed at an earlier period than they otherwise would have been, as sometimes they never attend religious worship except on special occasions. During the season of confirmation it is customary to see young girls, carrying bouquets of white and green, and followed by the gentleman friends and relatives, who always walk to the cemetery and place the bouquets on the graves of their departed

ADDITIONAL LOCAL

WHATEVER from natural causes may have tended to create prejudice, or whatever in the political past may have been unfortunate, in connection with the name of the Republican candidate for State Representative in this District, there are certain self-evident truths which weigh heavily in his favor, and should go far in governing the action of the voters of Charlevoix county at the next election. Mr. Wood, in many ways closely identified with the interests of Charlevoix county, and is more thoroughly acquainted with its wants than any candidate before the people. The hitherto cassions of Mr. Wood will acknowledge his ability, and his untiring and undivided attention to public duties. No one doubts that if elected, he will be true to Charlevoix county in any contingency which may possibly arise.

STRAWBERRIES.—It is well known in Charlevoix, and is no credit of the plainest proof, that the Greenback candidate for Clerk and Register was up to and including the day of the late Republican county convention, a Republican, and a candidate for office at the hands of that party. From that moment his heart commenced to bleed for the misguided sorrows of the tinseling and agricultural classes. From that hour his soul overflowed with holiness for the benefit of the reformers of the Republican party, and its henchmen the honest bondholders. From that hour he resolved to devote his life's soul-love to the great and glorious National Greenback party. His transition from the Republican party, with which he had associated twenty-one years, to the Greenback party, was the event of a day, and that day was the occasion of the Republican county convention. No comment is necessary.

THE GREENBACKERS IN TROUBLE.—The dance to pay and to pitch not! We recently volunteered the editorial opinion that the nomination of F. M. Loveland for County Treasurer was without his knowledge or consent. On Thursday he returned from the East, and proves to be a Greenbacker, never was, and has authorized no person to use his name in connection with any office. This reckless act on the part of Mr. Loveland disembowels the Greenback county ticket. It takes the starch all out of it, and the rest of the candidates on the ticket are scratching their heads to chagrin. Loveland was the only name upon the ticket that stood a shadow of a chance of getting even the full Greenback vote. As the ticket returns, we are of the opinion that any person who votes it evidently owes Charlevoix county a grudge that nothing but such an act of recklessness could satisfy. There is not a redeeming feature in it, and it will die the death of the unpetent on the 5th of November. Don't you forget it.

If you want anything in the grocery line go to See & Washburn's.

Quite a good many intelligent old time Republicans of this city and vicinity, who embraced the Greenback theory last spring, having become convinced after mature reflection that it is not what they had supposed it to be, have abandoned the "Gnashuil" party, and returned to their first love. Many other thinking men are carefully investigating the money question, and will have the "Gnashuil" ranks in due time.—Big Rapids Pioneer Magnet.

Hon. H. M. Look, of Pontiac, the accomplished lawyer, poet, author and orator, has at last seen so low, through the use of intoxicating drinks, as to be sent to the Detroit House of Correction. Justice Beach, of Pontiac, sentenced him last week to 65 days in that institution for being drunk and disorderly.

The State Capitol is completed and accepted. It will be furnished and ready for occupancy sometime in the month of November.

Correspondence.

CHARLEVOIX, MICH., OCT. 15, 1878.

EDS. EDITOR:

The question that seems to be trembling a great many of our Republican friends seems to be the question of duty as the coming election in regard to the candidate for Representative in this District. All are agreed that the Republican nominee gained his nomination through the old trick of manipulating primaries and other tricks known to the trade. 'Tis a question which any honest Republican ought to settle without a moment's hesitation. If you do consent to be a partner to such tricks, you cast at the polls rebuke the trickster. As honest Republicans, wishing to maintain the honor and good name of the party you are bound to do it. If we allow a man to force himself upon us by tricks we well deserve the name of blind partisans. Such things and such men are ruining the good name of the party. Several of our old party friends who had a strong desire to serve the party in some office, and being disappointed, have gone over to the party of purity (?) Others should be given to understand that they, too, can seek preferment where they naturally belong. Favoritism complains that they were cheated out of their representation in county conventions, and counties were cheated at the representative conventions, as in the case of Antrim county, where at least three delegates disappointed their constituents. But, says one, we must stand by the regular nominee. I say the same; but a nomination obtained through trickery is not regular, and every true Republican should at his seat disapprove upon it. Others can do as they please, but as for me, no party lash was ever long enough to lash me into the traces to work for such political shysters; but without lash or spur I am free to work for the good old cause in Nation, State and County, and that cause demands that we rid the party of every corrupt man or influence.

YOURS,
ROBERT MILLER.

A new postal accommodation went into effect on the first of October, by which third-class matter, such as merchandise, etc., may be registered by the payment of ten cents Register fee, in addition to the one cent per ounce.

A Remarkable Result.

It makes no difference how many Physicians, or how much medicine you have tried, it is now an estimated fact that German Syrup is the only remedy which has given complete satisfaction in severe cases of Lung Diseases. It is true there are yet thousands of persons whose are prejudiced to Throat and Lung Affections, Consumption, Hemorrhages, Asthma, Bronchitis, Coughs, Colds, Croup, Incipient Consumption, Bleeding of the Lungs, Pneumonia, Whooping Cough, &c., who have no personal knowledge of Boschee's German Syrup. To such we would say that 500,000 dozen were sold last year without one complaint. Consumptives try just one bottle. Regular size 75 cents. Sold by your Druggist, Geo. W. Conover.

An Astonishing Fact.

A large proportion of the American people are to-day dying from the effects of Dyspepsia or disordered liver. The result of these diseases upon the masses of intelligent and valuable people is most alarming, making life actually a burden instead of a pleasant existence of enjoyment and usefulness as it ought to be. There is no good reason for this, if you will only throw aside prejudices and skepticism, take the advice of your Druggist, Geo. W. Conover, and your friends, and try one bottle of Green's August Flower. Your speedy relief is certain. Millions of bottles of this medicine have been given away to try its virtues, with satisfactory results in every case. You can buy a Sample Bottle for 10 cents to try. Three doses will relieve the worst case. Positively sold by all Druggists on the Western Continent.

EDS. SENTINEL:

Perhaps Mr. Editor Miller has a few words to say in the last issue of your paper in reference to the petition for Representation in this District, in which he says good men in my stead "sticks," "stinks," "rancid republicanism," "slavishness," etc. He says, "Charlevoix county should first thing have been consulted on their representation at county conventions," and that "we never have been consulted at the Representative conventions," and then elsewhere he says "the case of Antrim county," and asserts that "at least three delegates from Antrim county disappointed their constituents."

Now, Mr. Editor, it is on this "case of Antrim county" that I take issue with Mr. Miller, as I am thoroughly acquainted with it. I have been a lifelong Republican, have been identified with the Republican party in Antrim county for the last thirteen years, and was one of the delegates from Antrim county to the Representative convention at Charlevoix referred to in Mr. Miller's communication, and know what I am talking about. And I assert that but one of the delegates referred to from Antrim county disappointed his constituents, and that one was the man who, when Steele's name was dropped, voted for Canby.

Perhaps Mr. Miller does not know that seven ballots and considerable labor in the representative convention two years ago, when Mr. Steele was nominated, he was not to be a candidate for re-nomination, and that Mr. Wood would be entitled to the support of Antrim county? If he does now, I do! And now, Mr. Editor, would it not seem to any one acquainted with the facts that the question referred to trouble Mr. Miller only, and that he has allowed himself to be converted into this honest policy that he is talking about, for the purpose of defeating Mr. Wood, and that the sole cause is local jealousy. Am I this is what he calls "honest Republicanism?"

Yours truly,
WM. J. GETTY.

BUSINESS.—Here is something for the voters of Charlevoix county to consider. To encourage Home Industry has been instituted to us. He has secured two appropriations for our harbor, against opposition. He can do more to secure another than a new man. He has been the means of putting Charlevoix in the list of government harbors, and it will be no more than a just acknowledgement of his valuable services for every voter in the county to vote for him this fall. Any person in Charlevoix county who votes against him votes directly against his own interests. See that Hubbell's name is on your ticket.

MASONIC.—The Worshipful Master of Charlevoix Lodge F. & A. M. announces that the next Regular communication of said Lodge will occur on Tuesday, Nov. 5th. On that evening the Lodge will be called off until the following evening—Nov. 6—at which time a general attendance of the members is desired, as business of importance is to come before the Lodge.

RECREATION MEETINGS.—WATT S. Humphrey, of Cheboygan, speaks on the issue of the day on Tuesday evening at Advance, Wednesday evening at the head of South Arm, Thursday evening at the Whitford School House, and Friday evening at Norwood. Arrangements have been made whereby all who desire to attend either the Advance or South Arm meetings, can get a free ride on the steamer Gazelle to and from the meetings free of charge. The Gazelle will leave Charlevoix on the afternoon of Tuesday and Wednesday at four o'clock, and remain at the place of meeting until after the speech, returning everybody to their homes. Mr. Humphrey is a ready speaker, is thoroughly posted on the question of finance, and will strike some hard blows for honest money. Be sure and hear him.

C. J. PAILTHORP, has something to say on the eighth page of this paper.

General News Summary.

DOMESTIC.

A FEW days ago messengers from Sitting Bull reached Fort Keogh asking for terms for the surrender of that Chieftain and his followers. On the 24th, Gen. Sheridan telegraphed to Gen. Miles that the only terms he could offer were those of unconditional surrender.

ABOUT 600 Mormons arrived at New York on the 26th. They are mostly Danes, and started at once for the West.

TWO HAT-MANUFACTURING firms of New York City entered into an agreement, on the 26th, with the Retail Association, to have nothing further to do with convict labor, and that, in the event of any breach in the agreement on the part of the firms, they would pay the Association $10,000 for each infringement. The various shops on a strike in New Jersey were notified at once of this compact.

SECY SHERMAN received an anonymous communication from Boston, on the 27th, inclosing $1,500, to be placed to the credit of the "conscience fund," in the United States Treasury.

ON the 26th, the ironclad steamer-coach running between Deadwood and Cheyenne was attacked by road agents and robbed of about $3000. But the only passenger was killed, and two of the messengers badly wounded.

ON the 26th, Thomas Harland, Toledo's attorney in the locomotive case, was arrested on his arrival at Detroit, upon the charge of being privy to the recent larceny of certain account books which were being examined before a United States Commissioner, at Marquette, Mich. On the following day he was arraigned before a United States Commissioner at Detroit, and held to bail in the sum of $10,000 for future examination.

THE Chinese Embassy was formally received by President Hayes, on the 28th ult. The ceremony was private.

SENOR ZAMACONA, the Mexican Minister at Washington, said, on the 28th ult., that the purpose of his Government in sending 5,000 troops to the border was to suppress rattling and aid the United States troops in putting down lawlessness.

THE United States Treasury held, on the 28th ult., $249,356,000 in United States bonds to secure National Bank circulation, and $15,855,000 to secure public deposits.

DR. COLLIER, the chemist of the Agricultural Department, at Washington, has recently been experimenting, on a large scale, in the manufacture of crystallized sugar from cornstalks and sorghum. From 11,207 pounds of the former he secured 2,779 pounds of juice, and from 13,588 pounds of the latter, 4,963 pounds of juice. Concentrated, the first amount of 2,541 pounds yielded 393 pounds of sugar, and 4,385 pounds of sorghum-juice yielded 660 pounds of syrup. This latter contained 75 per cent. of its weight in sugar. The mill used in these experiments was an indifferent one, and the sorghum was in small stalks. With a better mill, Dr. Collier thinks farmers may rely upon results 50 per cent. greater than the above. In these cases he got a good crystallized sugar.

ABOUT eight o'clock, on the morning of the 29th, the steamer Adelphi, running between Norwalk, Conn., and New York, left her dock at the former city. When about one mile out her boiler exploded, tearing a hole in her port side about twenty feet square. She had 300 passengers on board, of whom ten were killed and about twenty more or less injured.

DURING September, there were thirty failures in New York City, with liabilities aggregating $4,865,072, and assets, $2,701,417.

THE Dime Savings Bank of Hartford, Conn., suspended, on the 30th ult. Its deposit account is $493,978.

O'LEARY, the Chicago pedestrian, and John Hughes, of Newark, N. J., started on a six days' walking contest in New York City, on the night of the 29th ult., for $500 and the champion belt.

YELLOW-FEVER NEWS.

THE death of Dr. Ribbee, the inventor of the fever cot, who went to New Orleans to introduce and test his system of cold-water treatment of fever patients, was announced on the 26th. He certainly had his own remedy, which failed in his case, although it is said to have resulted successful with other patients.

WILLIAM ROCKWOOD, President of the Howard Association of Memphis, died on that city, on the 26th. His death-bed scene is said to have been very touching. He died on the field of honor and duty, and many of the public buildings and private dwellings were draped in mourning because of his loss, which loss was sadly felt by all.

SECY-OF-WAR MCCRARY stated, on the 26th, that he was advised that the Howard Association had on hand, unexpended, a balance probably sufficient for their wants at New Orleans and Memphis. He thought the Association perfectly reliable, and had ordered no investigation. At all afflicted points save New Orleans and Memphis suffering and want were great, and, he thought, increasing, and even in those cities more help might be required in the near future. The people could scarcely go amiss in sending further aid.

A DISPATCH from Vicksburg, on the 27th, says the death-rate at Greenville, Miss., had been quite the extreme. Out of a population of 400 people, 319 had died up to the 26th, and there were only fifteen persons in the place who had escaped the fever so far. Mr. Perry's family of eleven persons, and three nurses who were in attendance upon them, all died within a few days of each other. The deaths occurred so rapidly in that town that it was impossible to bury the bodies properly, and they had to be covered with earth in shallow holes. To prevent the citizens of the place from seeking safety in flight the people in the country blockaded the roads and destroyed the bridges over the streams, but this had not prevented the spread of the fever through many portions of the country.

A DISPATCH from Henderson Landing was received at Vicksburg, on the 28th ult., appealing for physicians, nurses and ice. The people were helpless. Two deaths had occurred that morning, and not less than fifteen persons were then down with the fever.

THE New York Committee on the Collection of Clothing for the Yellow-Fever Sufferers issued a strong appeal, on the 28th ult., for clothing. The members speak in great earnestness of the sufferings which the survivors throughout the infected districts must endure as soon as frosts appear.

A NUMBER of refugees, who had prematurely returned to Vicksburg, were down with the fever on the 29th ult. Some of them were attacked as soon as they reached their houses in that city. A special to the Chicago Tribune states emphatically that it is wrong for absentees to return to any of the fever-infected towns until after several killing frosts. The Tribune suggests that those families or persons from the South who are sojourning in Northern towns, and are in need of pecuniary help, should receive aid from the fund raised for the South, thus enabling them to stay away from their homes until all danger is over.

SEVERAL contributions were received, on the 30th ult., to assist in loading a steamer at St. Louis with supplies for the yellow-fever sufferers at the settlements along the Mississippi River.

THE fever was still spreading, in many of the smaller towns in Louisiana and Mississippi, on the 30th ult. The reports from New Orleans, Memphis and Vicksburg were somewhat encouraging, although the disease was dealing new victims in the persons of returning refugees. A Memphis telegram says the fever there had assumed a milder form, and yielded quite readily to treatment. There were many collections of a revival of business in Vicksburg. The excitement in Cairo, Ill., had subsided, and absentees were returning to the city. The public schools in that place were opened on the 30th ult.

JOHN M. WOODWORTH, Surgeon-General of the United States Hospital Marine Service, issued a circular, on the 30th ult., in which he details the preliminary efforts to secure a Commission to investigate the yellow-fever question—as to the origin, etc., of the disease. He states that Mrs. Elizabeth Thompson, a noble lady of New York, having offered to contribute sufficient means to meet the expenses of the proposed Commission, he had appointed Prof. S. M. Bemis, M. D., of New Orleans, Jerome Cochran, M. D., of Mobile, and a third member, whose acceptance had not yet been received, to act as such Commission. Should such contributions be sufficient, or Congress so direct, two or three scientific experts will subsequently be attached to the Commission. George W. Rigg, of Rigg & Co., bankers, Washington City, had consented to act as Treasurer to receive and disburse the additional funds which may be contributed for the expenses of the Commission.

PERSONAL AND POLITICAL.

THE National Executive Committee of the Union League of America held a meeting at Pittsburgh, Pa., on the 24th, at which a resolution was adopted in favor of a currency convention on demand into coin, and pledging the efforts of the committee to promote the election of those candidates only who stand on such a financial platform. President Hayes, who was in the city, was present at the meeting for a short time, and was received with great enthusiasm.

THE Nevada Democratic State Convention met, on the 25th, and adopted a hard-money platform, advocating the removal of all restrictions upon the circulation of silver, the following nominations were made: Governor, L. R. Bradley (present incumbent); Lieutenant-Governor, J. M. Adams; Member of Congress, W. E. F. Deal.

THE Republicans of Connecticut held their State Convention, at Hartford, on the 26th, and nominated Charles R. Andrews for Governor; David Galler for Lieutenant-Governor, David Torrence for Secretary of State, Tallman Baker for State Treasurer, and Chauncey Howard for Comptroller. The platform adopted declares the Government bonds and legal-tender notes to be sacred debts, to be paid in the last dollar in the standard money of the world; demands that all currency shall be kept at par with the gold standard of the world, and expresses faith in the integrity and patriotism of President Hayes.

THE President arrived at Washington from his Western trip, on the 26th, and was soon thereafter in separate conference with members of his Cabinet. He is said to have expressed himself as being much pleased with his reception, both public and private, at the different points along his recent journey to and from the Northwest.

THE Democratic State Convention of Massachusetts met at Faneuil Hall, in Boston, on the 25th, pursuant to the adjournment ordered by the State Executive Committee at Worcester. J. G. Abbott was nominated for Governor by acclamation. W. E. Plunkett for Lieutenant-Governor, H. C. Dewing for Secretary of State, D. N. Shilling for State Treasurer and Receiver, J. F. Fitzgerald for Auditor, and Richard Olney for Attorney-General. After denouncing the Republican party for the alleged disregard of the admitted rights of States and of the people, etc., the resolutions adopted declare that the Democratic party has ever been the trusted friend of the laboring classes, and demand the enactment and execution of such laws as shall protect the rights of labor as well as those of capital, that the total amount of currency authorized should be fixed by law and redeemable at any moment in coin, should be receivable for public dues at its face value, and that all coin of the same denomination shall be nearly as possible of equal value.

THE New York Republicans met in State Convention at Saratoga, on the 26th, and organized by the selection of Hon. Reuben Conkling as Permanent Chairman. Hon. George F. Danforth was nominated for Judge of the Court of Appeals. The platform adopted demands that the pledges in respect to the payment of the National debt be asserted by observed; favors specie resumption and making greenbacks of equal value with coin; declares that all parties are bound to abide by the decision of the Electoral Commission; warns the people to be vigilant in opposing Southern claims; insists upon free and uninthimidated elections in the South; favors national Civil-Service reform; arraigns the dominant forces of the Democratic party as constant disturbers of the public tranquillity and the public peace, etc., etc.

THE New York Democracy met in State Convention at Syracuse, on the 25th, and, after some contention over the question of delegates from New York and Kings County, Committees on Credentials and Resolutions were appointed, and an adjournment was had to the next day. After reassembling, on the 26th, Erastus Brooks was chosen Permanent Chairman. G. R. Bradley was nominated for Judge of the Court of Appeals, on a platform reaffirming the principles set forth in the platforms of 1874 and 1877, that gold and silver coin, and a paper currency convertible into coin at the will of the holder, should be the only currency of the country, and that steady steps be taken toward specie payments and the honest payment of the public debt; declaring in favor of a tariff for revenue; no Government partnership with protective monopolies, etc., etc.

THE New Hampshire State Prohibition Convention is to be held at Nashua, on the 25th of October.

THE Democratic State Convention of Nebraska was held at Lincoln, on the 26th, and adopted a soft-money platform, and nominated John B. Howe (also on the Greenback ticket) for Governor; Judge Alexander C. Bear for Congress, short term; J. W. Davis (on Greenback ticket) for Congress, long term; J. R. Webster for Governor; E. J. Mead for Lieutenant-Governor; Benjamin Farnes, ton for Secretary of State, E. B. Benton for Treasurer; S. H. Calhoun (on Greenback ticket) for Attorney-General.

THE released Fenian prisoners, Edward O'Meagher Condon and Patrick Reilly, reached New York, on the 26th, on the Moselle. They were warmly welcomed by their compatriots and countrymen.

An Interesting Legal Decision.

TWO advertisements of Master's sale were published in the Dover, N. J., Index. On the day of the sale the defendants protested against it, declaring that the sale was not legal, the notice thereof having been published in a newspaper using a "patent outside," printed outside the State, was a newspaper printed in the State in which legal notices might be legally advertised. The following is a true copy of the decision of Chancellor Runyon and Vice-Chancellor Van Fleet, and very clearly settles the question relative to the legality of such advertising:

IN CHANCERY OF NEW JERSEY.

of Dover, Respondent.

Upon petition filed in this Court by the above stated petitioner, to set aside a sale made in pursuance of the mortgage of Jesse Hammond to the National Union Bank of Dover, New Jersey, to secure the payment of certain promissory notes of the defendants, and upon the advertisement of such sale in a newspaper printed outside of the State, and upon the statute in such cases made and provided, and upon proof being made that the notice of such sale had been published in the Dover Index, and that the advertisement of said sale was legal, sufficient, and was a substantial and literal compliance with the statutory requirements in the premises, on the twentieth day of July in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight, ordered and decreed by his Honor, Theodore Runyon, Chancellor of New Jersey, that the prayer of said petition be denied and the said petition be dismissed.

A WOMAN WITH NEW SHOES.

When a woman has a new pair of shoes sent home she performs altogether different from a man. She never shoves her toes into them and yanks and hauls until she is red in the face and all out of breath and then goes stamping around, but pulls them on part of the way carefully, twitches them off again to take a look at the lining, as if she has got the right one, pulls them on again, looks at them dreamily, says they don't look right, then takes another look, stops suddenly to smooth out a wrinkle, twists around and surveys them sideways, exclaims "Sorry, how loose they are," looks at them again square in front, works her foot around so they won't hurt her quite so much, takes them off, looks at the heel, the toe, the bottom and the inside, puts them on again, walks up and down the room once or twice, remarks to her better half that she won't have them at any price, tilts down the mirror so that she can see how they look, turns in every possible direction and generally indicates her neck trying to see how they look from that way, backs off, steps up again, looks thirsty or forty farewell looks, says they make her feet look awful big and never will do in the world, puts them off and on three or four times more, asks her husband what he thinks about it, and then pays no attention to what he says, goes through the same performance once more and will take them. It's a very simple matter, indeed.—Albany (N. Y.) Argus.

THERE are some scenes almost too pure and sacred to be viewed by the thoughtless world. One of them is a two-hundred-pound woman with a nodon on her chin "talking baby" to an eleven-and-a-half canary bird in a brass cage.—Rockland Courier.

CONDN, Hoarseness, Asthma, or any Irritation of the Throat or Bronchial Tubes, will be relieved by taking Dr. Bull's Cough Syrup. It has cured thousands. Recommend it to your friend and neighbor. Your druggist keeps it. Price, 25 cents.

AT LAST.

Upon the earth a pilgrim wandered slowly
In search of treasures hid from mortal sight,
Yet greeted unto those whose lives were lowly,
Whose faith was infinite.

He had his visions, full of life and sweetness,
That opened like a flower in his soul,
And knew him hope for splendor and completeness
Was his.

When he attained the goal.

He stretched his hand to pluck a dainty blossom
That might a wealth of happiness impart,
But when he pressed it closely to his bosom
The thorn pierced through his heart.

Still young and hopeful, e'en though late was regret,
He firmly walked across the desert sand,
Joy sparkling in his eyes at one bright jewel
That glittered in the sand.

In ashy lifelessness, and left the pilgrim holding
A worthless bit of clay.

"Since Love and Joy," he said (poet, patient
To use the blessedness of bliss deep),
I may but find in Truth, the jewel eternal
Where Peace dwells, by and by."

He journeyed on until the day's declining
Brought him at last the pearly gates ajar,
And on his free was seen the glory shining
Around a star.

The goal is reached! The door of Heaven unfolds
Earth's fetters seem at each struggling breath
And soon the homesick, lonely one rejoices
In the embrace of Death.

From all the disappointments and denials
That were his before perfect in the soul,
From all life's curse, imperfect and fallible,
He has found Rest at last!

Weep not that mortal has become immortal;
Thrice and that ended is the unequal strife;
Were wheels only through nightly darkness roll.
Death is the gate of Life!

JOHN, JUN.

John Basil Ximines, Greek merchant, of Mincing Lane, London, was in trouble. Not financial trouble, for the old house stood on a firm foundation; and no one knew this better than Sam Postlethwaite, confidential bookkeeper of the firm, and the most trusted friend of the Greek merchant. Therefore, when he saw John Basil in go anxious a mood, he resolved to know and to share his sorrow.

"Master," he said, "you're in trouble. What is it?"

"John, Jun.," was the prompt reply.

"He takes no interest in the business, and if he comes to the office, grambles and blunders till we are glad to see him leave things. You know it is so, Sam."

"John, Jun., wants an object to work for, sir. If he had designs for the future, he would not, perhaps, be half so careless and uninterested. No doubt of it, sir."

"He has lost interest in everything, hunting, yachting, shooting, travel, everything is a bore."

"Any lady in the case?"

"Why don't you like her?"

"She is poor, beside, John is to marry Donna Zelton. He bought the estate with the view, and we suspect will make the finest in Middlesex. You can put them togethern a ring-fence."

"If you have told John, Jun., this, he will never marry her."

"I have said nothing to John, yet. Zelton and I have talked over the matter, but the girl Leanora is yet at school."

The two men sat thoughtfully a few minutes and then Sam Postlethwaite made an astonishing proposal. "If John Basil," he said, decidedly, "if you wish to make a man of your son, give up the business to him entirely. You go to Zante for a year or two, and let him feel his feet. Put him in your place. I will see no interference either to him or the business. Drop a few hard words about Zelton before you go; it may help your plans for Leanora." And half an hour's further conversation made the old clerk's plans clear to the father.

That night he said to his son, "John, there are serious changes in hand. I go to Zante, and the business in Mincing Lane will need your closest attention and industry. It is a great charge for a young man, but Sam says I may trust you."

John rose at once to the occasion: "To be sure you may trust me, father. If the old house of Ximines is in danger, I will work for it night and day."

"John, thank you. You make me very happy and hopeful. If we thin things over this year, we may not only keep our standing, but also add greatly to our influence. And, John, don't let this place run down. I don't want Zelton to get the better of me in this matter; but don't have anything to do with them—nothing whatever."

John readily promised. The next day his father left for Greece, and he went at once to the front in the daily fight in Mincing Lane. He was a man sure to fail and weary in small routine, but a whom great trusts developed great resources and untiring energy; and Sam made him believe that the very existence of the house of Ximines depended upon his personal oversight and influence.

It was about a year after his father's departure for Zante that Sam said, one warm evening in June, "Mr. John, you had better run down a to the country and see after the place. A change will do you good, and now that you have got the better of Zelton about those olives, there is nothing pressing for a week."

So John went to the country, resolved to lie and dream under the blossoming hilacs, and throw all care away. He was fully carrying out this intention one warm, sunny afternoon, when he heard a little stir of conversation, and the rippling music of girlish laughter. This side of the garden adjoined a little wooded park, through which ran a rapid brook famous for its excellent trout fishing. As it was strictly private ground, he wondered who were the trespassers, and quietly moved aside the foliage to look.

The picture that met his view was a very pretty one. Upon a rocky elevation, shaded by a drooping birch, stood a beautiful girl, with a fishing-rod in her hand, and at her feet reclined the splendid-haired woman whom he had known as governess to the daughters of Sir Thomas Oakes. She was reading, while her charge whipped the tributing waters with a grace and skill John, Jun., had never seen equalled.

John looked and wondered and admired. He knew the governess, and had once been half in love with her beauty, but now he thought her hardly worth looking at in comparison with her companion. Who could she be? His recent contact with life had taught him to be prompt and self-reliant, and he soon decided that it would be a very agreeable thing for him to join the idlers upon the rocks.

There was a little wicket further down. He opened it and at once faced the intruders. There was no retreat for them, and John quietly passed over to John: "Very important. Mr. John Ximines, Jun., wanted in Zante at once."

"What am I to do about Leanora, Sam? What am I to do?"

"Write to her, and go to Zante at once; there is nothing else to be done." Sam's face was so impassive John saw resistance was useless; and indeed Sam felt so urgent that he found himself by midnight on the way to Greece.

"Very important" his journey might be to the house of Ximines, but very unwelcome to the young man who felt ill. Indeed, he was so evidently wretched that his father hurried back to London with him as soon as possible. But when they arrived John found that the Zeltons were in France, and would not return till Christmas. There was nothing to do but wait and hope, and he was encouraged by the fact that the houses of Zelton and Ximines had lately had very large transactions together.

Sam drew his attention first to this circumstance, and advised John, Jun., to make a confidant of his father, who would take the old Greek in regular form for the hand of his daughter. This was three days before Christmas, and the letter was sent upon the 23d of December. Before the Ximineses could receive any answer to it, a letter from Zelton, also dated on the 23d, came to John Basil, saying: "Our lands join, our business is intimately connected; why should not our families be happy together? Come and spend Christmas at Zelton Hall."

The concession, therefore, was as unusual as it had been so arranged, and Sam talked a great deal about this wonderful unanimity of feeling. But John, Jun., was too happy to have any suspicions, and his happy Christmas visit was only the prelude to that grand wedding which took place three months afterward in St. Pancras Church, and when the handsome Anglo-Greek bride and bridegroom were the theme of every tongue.

"A very suitable wedding, indeed," said the magnates of Mincing Lane—"unites two fine estates and two old firms."

"A very handsome, loving couple," said John Basil to Sam; "and it is your doing, old friend."

"Yes," he said, cheerily, "it is my doing. I have made a good merchant and a good match."—Harper's Weekly.

Disraeli's Devoted Wife.

Disraeli's name is on every tongue just now. But how many know of the devoted partner in that life who, though fifteen years his senior, loved him with a tenderness seldom equalled, cheered, consoled and encouraged him in defeat, and partook of his joy and exultation in success? It was this habit to prepare his speeches with great care, to study them closely, and just before leaving home for the House of Commons, to read them through for the last time. After this final reading, during which he became utterly absorbed with his topic, he never wished to be spoken to, feeling that any interruption would disturb and disarrange the current of his thoughts. When the hour for starting came, he would go silently to his carriage, his hat taking a seat by his side, but neither uttering a syllable. Arrived at the House, she, who never missed hearing him speak, would go to the gallery, set apart for the wives of members, while he would make his way to his place and there remain undeserved until the time for his speech arrived. That over, he went directly to the gallery to receive his wife's congratulation and applause, desirous to him than that of the hundreds of adherents who hung upon his words. On one occasion, just as the hair were leaving home, when the footman closed the door of the brougham, the lady's finger was caught and held. The pain was excruciating, but no token of suffering escaped her. In silent agony she rode to the House, went to her accustomed seat in the gallery and listened to her husband's speech, and it was not until he came to her, after it was over, that he knew of the accident. We may smile at this over-strained heroism, but we must respect the woman who preferred to suffer rather than risk her husband's success.—Chr. Boston Transcript.

MISSING men—bad marksmen.

Sam's advice just pleased the eager lover. He was for taking it at once, and Sam did not oppose him, though John might have wondered if he had seen the face that followed his footsteps. "The lesson is pretty nearly learned," he muttered. "It takes an old bachelor like me to bring up a young man properly," and the good fellow dipped his pen in his ink with a self-satisfied chuckle.

John returned in high spirits. Leonora was an angel, she was willing to be his wife, no matter how humbly they must begin. She was coming to London next day on a visit to her aunt, and would meet him in St. Pancras Church next Saturday morning. He would have a special license by that time, and Sam could be witness.

Sam said of course he could. But Sam had no idea of doing such a thing. He put on his hat soon after and went to Alexander Zelton's office. The two men did not meet like those who have a chronic quarrel about consignments, but like old friends. They clasped hands, and went together into an inner room, from which soon came sounds of pleasant good-fellowship. Then Sam telegraphed to John Basil Ximines, in Zante, thus: "Send for John, Jun., immediately."

After this piece of business, Sam was very busy all day, and kept John by his side. They were eating a late dinner together, when a telegram was brought for them, which he quietly passed over to John: "Very important. Mr. John Ximines, Jun., wanted in Zante at once."

"Then, Mr. John, it is not flowers that is taking you."

General News Summary.

DOMESTIC.

A FEW days ago messengers from Sitting Bull reached Fort Keogh asking for terms for the surrender of that Chieftain and his followers. On the 24th, inst. Sheridan telegraphed to Gen. Miles that the only terms he could offer were those of unconditional surrender.

ABOUT 600 Mormons arrived at New York on the 30th. They are mostly Danes, and elected at once for the West.

TWO HAT-MANUFACTURING firms of New York City entered into an agreement, on the 26th, with the Hatters' Association, to have nothing further to do with convict labor, and that, in the event of any breach in the agreement on the part of the firms, they would pay the Association $10,000 for each infringement. The various shops on a strike in New Jersey were notified at once of this compact.

SECY SHERMAN received an anonymous communication from Boston, on the 27th, inclosing $1,500, to be placed to the credit of the "conscience fund," in the United States Treasury.

ON the 26th, the ironclad transcontinental train between Deadwood and Cheyenne was attacked by road-agents and robbed of about $20,000. The only passenger was killed, and two of the messengers badly wounded.

ON the 26th, Thomas Harland, Tilden's attorney in the income-tax case, was arrested on his arrival at Detroit, upon the charge of being privy to the recent larceny of certain account books which were being examined before a United States Commissioner, at Marquette, Mich. On the following day he was arraigned before a United States Commissioner at Detroit, and held to bail in the sum of $10,000 for future examination.

THE Chinese Embassy was formally received by President Hayes, on the 28th ult. The ceremony was private.

SENOR ZAMACONA, the Mexican Minister at Washington, said, on the 28th ult., that the purpose of his Government in sending 5,000 troops to the border was to suppress rafting and aid the United States troops in putting down lawlessness.

THE United States Treasury held, on the 28th ult., $340,956,000 in United States bonds to secure National Bank circulation, and $18,895,600 to secure public deposits.

DR. COLLIER, the chemist of the Agricultural Department, at Washington, has recently been experimenting, on a large scale, in the manufacture of crystallized sugar from cornstalks and sorghum. From 11,207 pounds of the former he secured 2,773 pounds of juice, and from 15,968 pounds of the latter, 4,993 pounds of juice. Cornstalk-juice to the amount of 2,551 pounds yielded 382 pounds of sirup, and 1,380 pounds of sorghum-juice yielded 660 pounds of sirup. This sirup contained 75 per cent. of its weight in sugar. The still-used in these experiments was an indifferent one, and the sorghum in many instances. With a better mill, Dr. Collier thinks farmers may easily obtain results 50 per cent. greater than the above. In these cases he got a good crystallized sugar.

YELLOW-FEVER NEWS.

THE death of Dr. Kibbee, the inventor of the fever cot, who went to New Orleans to introduce and test his system of cold-water treatment of fever patients, was announced on the 24th. He submitted to his own remedy, which killed in his case, although it is said to have resulted succesfully with other patients.

WILLIAM ROCKWOOD, President of the Howard Association of Vicksburg, died, on that city, on the 26th. His death-bed scene is said to have been very touching. He died on the field of honor and duty, and many of the public buildings and private dwellings were draped in mourning because of his loss, which loss was sorely felt by all.

SEC'Y-OF-WAR MCCRARY stated, on the 26th, that he was advised that the Howard Association had on hand, unexpended, a balance probably sufficient for their wants at New Orleans and Memphis. He thought the Association perfectly reliable, and had ordered no investigation. At all afflicted points save New Orleans and Memphis sufferiug and want were great, and he thought, increasing, and even in those cities more help might be required in the near future. The people could scarcely go amiss in sending further aid.

A DISPATCH from Vicksburg, on the 27th, says the death-rate at Grenada, Miss., had been horrible in the extreme. Out of a population of 600 people, 310 had died up to the 26th, and there were only fifteen persons in the place who had escaped the fever so far. Mr. Perry's family of eleven persons, and three nurses who were in attendance upon them, all died within a few days of each other. The deaths occurred so rapidly in that town that it was impossible to bury the bodies properly, and they had to be covered with earth in shallow holes. To prevent the offiasma of the place from seeking safety in flight the people in the country blockaded the roads and destroyed the bridges over the streams, but this had not prevented the spread of the fever through many portions of the country.

A DISPATCH from Henderson Landing was received at Vicksburg, on the 28th ult., appealing for physicians, nurses and ice. The people were helpless. Two deaths had occurred that morning, and not less than fifteen persons were then down with the fever.

THE New York Committee on the Collection of Clothing for the Yellow-Fever Sufferers issued a strong appeal, on the 26th ult., for clothing. The members speak in great earnestness of the sufferings which the survivors throughout the infected districts must endure as soon as frosts appear.

A NUMBER of refugees, who had prematurely returned to Vicksburg, were down with the fever on the 29th ult. Some of them were attacked as soon as they reached their houses in that city. A special to the Chicago Tribune states emphatically that it is wrong for absentees to return to any of the fever-infected towns until after several killing frosts. The Tribune suggests that those families or persons from the south who are sojourning in Northern towns, and are in need of pecuniary help, should receive aid from the fund raised for the South, thus enabling them to stay away from their homes until all danger is over.

SEVERAL contributions were received, on the 30th ult., to assist in loading a steamer at St. Louis with supplies for the yellow-fever sufferers at the settlements along the Mississippi River.

THE fever was still spreading, in many of the smaller towns in Louisiana and Mississippi, on the 30th ult. The reports from New Orleans, Memphis and Vicksburg were somewhat encouraging, although the disease was finding new victims in the persons of refugees in the North and Northwest.

A Memphis telegram says the fever there had assumed a milder form, and yielded quite readily to treatment. There were many indications of a revival of business in Vicksburg. The excitement in Cairo, Ill., had subsided, and absentees were returning to the city. The public schools in that place opened on the 30th ult.

JOHN M. WOODWORTH, Surgeon-General of the United States Hospital Marine Service, issued a circular, on the 30th ult., in which he details the preliminary efforts to secure a Commission to investigate the yellow-fever question—as to the origin, etc., of the disease. He states that Mrs. Elizabeth Thompson, a noble lady of New York, having offered to contribute sufficient means to meet the expenses of the proposed Commission, he had appointed Prof. S. M. Bemis, M. D., of New Orleans, Jerome Cochran, M. D., of Mobile, and a third member, whose acceptance had not yet been received, to act as such Commission. Should contributions be sufficient, or Congress so direct, two or three scientific experts will subsequently be attached to the Commission. George W. Riggs, of Riggs & Co., bankers, Washington City, had consented to act as Treasurer to receive and disburse the additional funds which may be contributed for the expenses of the Commission.

PERSONAL AND POLITICAL.

THE National Executive Committee of the Union League of America held a meeting at Pittsburgh, Pa., on the 24th, at which a resolution was adopted in favor of a currency convertible on demand into coin, and pledging the efforts of the committee to promote the election of those candidates only who stand on such a financial platform. President Hayes, who was in the city, was present at the meeting for a short time, and was received with great enthusiasm.

THE Nevada Democratic State Convention met, on the 23d, and adopted a hard-money platform, advocating the removal of all restrictions upon the circulation of silver. The following nominations were made: Governor, R. K. Bradley (present incumbent); Lieutenant-Governor, J. M. Adams; Member of Congress, W. E. F. Beal.

THE Republicans of Connecticut held their State Convention, at Hartford, on the 24th, and nominated Charles R. Andrews for Governor, David Gallet for Lieutenant-Governor, David Torrence for Secretary of State, Tallman Baker for State Treasurer, and Chauncey Howard for Comptroller. The platform adopted declares the Government bonds and legal-tender notes to be sacred debts, to be paid to the last dollar in the standard money of the world; demands that all currency shall be kept at par with the gold standard of the world, and expresses faith in the integrity and patriotism of President Hayes.

THE President arrived at Washington, from his Western trip, on the 28th, and was soon thereafter in separate conference with members of his Cabinet. He is said to have expressed himself as being much pleased with the general result of his trip.

THE furor was still spreading, in many of the smaller towns in Louisiana and Mississippi, on the 30th ult. The reports from New Orleans, Memphis and Vicksburg were somewhat encouraging, although the disease was finding new victims in the persons of refugees in the North and Northwest. A Memphis telegram says the fever there had assumed a milder form, and yielded quite readily to treatment. There were many indications of a revival of business in Vicksburg. The excitement in Cairo, Ill., had subsided, and absentees were returning to the city. The public schools in that place opened on the 30th ult.

THE Democratic State Convention of Massachusetts met at Faneuil Hall, in Boston, on the 28th, pursuant to the adjournment ordered by the State Executive Committee at Worcester. J. C. Abbott was nominated for Governor by acclamation. W. E. Russell for Lieutenant-Governor, H. C. Deering for Secretary of State, D. N. Skilling for State Treasurer and Receiver, J. E. Fitzgerald for Auditor, and Richard Olney for Attorney-General. After denouncing the Republican party for its alleged disregard of the admitted rights of States and of the people, etc., the resolutions adopted declare that the Democratic party has ever been the truest friend of the laboring classes, and demand the enactment and execution of such laws as will protect the rights of labor as well as those of capital; that the total amount of currency authorized should be fixed by law and redeemable at any moment in coin, should be receivable for public dues at its face value, and that all coin of the same denomination shall be nearly as possible of equal value.

THE New York Republicans met in State Convention at Saratoga, on the 26th, and organized by the selection of Hon. Roscoe Conkling as Permanent Chairman. Hon. George F. Danforth was nominated for Judge of the Court of Appeals. The platform adopted demands that the pledges in respect to the payment of the National debt be scrupulously observed; favors specie resumption and making greenbacks of equal value with coin; declares that all parties are bound to abide by the decision of the Electoral Commission; warns the people to be vigilant in opposing Southern claims; insists upon free and unintimidated elections in the South; favors national Civil-Service reform; arraigns the dominant forces of the Democratic party as constant disturbers of the public tranquillity and the Public peace, etc., etc.

THE New York Democracy met in State Convention at Syracuse, on the 25th, and, after some contention over the question of delegates from New York and Kings County, Committees on Credentials and Resolutions were appointed, and an adjournment was had to the next day. After reassembling, on the 26th, Erastus Brooks was made Permanent Chairman. G. R. Bradley was nominated for Judge of the Court of Appeals, on a platform reaffirming the principles set forth in the platforms of 1874 and 1877, that gold and silver coin, and a paper currency convertible into coin at the will of the holder, should be the only currency of the country, and that timely steps be taken toward specie payments and the honest payment of the public debt; declaring in favor of a tariff for revenue; no Government partnership with protective monopolies, etc., etc.

THE New Hampshire State Prohibition Convention is to be held at Nashua, on the 18th of October.

J. Mead for Lieutenant-Governor; Benjamin Parmenter for Secretary of State; E. B. Benton for Auditor; T. H. Cumming for Treasurer; A. H. Calhoun (on Greenback ticket) for Attorney-General.

An Interesting Legal Decision.

Two advertisements of Master's sale were published in the Dover, N. J., Index. On the day of the sale the defendants protested against it, declaring that the sale was not legal, the notice thereof having been published in a newspaper using a "patent outside." The Master ordered the sale to take place. The defendants filed a petition that the sale might be stayed. The petition raised the question as to whether a newspaper using a "patent outside," printed outside the State, was a newspaper printed in the State in which legal notices might be legally advertised. The following is from copy of the decision of Chancellor Runyon and Vice-Chancellor Van Fleet, and very clearly settles the question relative to the legality of such advertising:

IN CHANCERY OF NEW JERSEY.

and
THE NATIONAL UNION BANK of Dover, Defendant.

On petition to set aside sale.

Upon petition filed in this Court by the above stated petitioner for a decree, etc., was issued restrained the consummation of a sale then contemplated by a certain Master in Chancery of this Court, pursuant to a decree of foreclosure, pleaded and set forth at length in the petition to which reference is hereby made for a more particular statement of the facts. The Union Bank of Dover, New Jersey, was complainant, and Samuel Dickerson, et al., were defendants therein, because the advertisement of said sale was deficient and gave rise to complaint. The details in such cases made and provided, for certain reasons in said petition alleged and set forth. And upon the matter being opened and argued by Mr. Dickerson, of counsel for the complainants and counsel of the petitioners and of the National Union Bank of Dover, New Jersey, it appears that the advertisement of said sale was legal and sufficient, and was published in accordance and compliance with the statutory requirements. It is, therefore, on this twentieth day of July, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-seven, ordered, adjudged and by this Honor, Theodore Runyon, Chancellor of New Jersey, that the prayer of said petition be denied and the said petition be dismissed.

Respectfully affixed.

THEODORE RUNYON, Chancellor.

A Woman With New Shoes.

When a woman has a new pair of shoes sent home she performs altogether different from a man. She never shoves her toes into them and yanks and hauls until she is red in the face, and all out of breath and then goes stamping around, but pulls them on part way carefully, stands erect and trusted friend of the Greek merchant. Therefore, when he saw John Basil in so anxious a mood, he resolved to know and to share his annoyance.

"Master," he said, "you're in trouble. What is it?"

"John, Jun.," was the prompt reply. "He takes no interest in the business, and if he comes to the office, grumbles and blusters, and you are glad to see him leave things. You know it is so, Sam."

"John, Jun., wants an object to work for, sir. If he thought the firm was in trouble now, he would be full of energy and interest. No doubt of it, sir."

"He has lost interest in everything, hunting, yachting, shooting, travel, everything is a bore."

"Talk to him, sir, in this case?"

"Why don't you like her?"

"She is poor; besides, John is to marry Leanora Zeiton. I bought the news with the view. You understand will make the house in Mincing Lane, can put them together in a ring-fence."

"If you have told John, Jun., this, he will never marry her."

"I have told nothing to John yet. Zeiton and I have talked over the matter, but the girl Leanora is yet at school."

The two men sat thoughtfully a few minutes, and then Sam Postlethwaite made an astounding proposal. "John Basil," he said, decidedly, "if you wish to make a man of your son, give up the business to him awhile. You go to Zante for a few days, and let him feel his feet. Put him in your place. I will see no harm comes either to him or the business. Drop a few hard words about Zeiton before you go; it may help your plans for Leanora." And half in humor a further conversation made the old clerk's plans clear to the father.

That night he said to his son, "John, there are worries always in hand. I must go to Zante, and the business in Mincing Lane will need your severest attention for a month or two. It is a great charge for a young man, but Sam says I may trust you."

John rose at once to the occasion: "To be sure you may trust me, father. If the old house of Ximines is in danger, I will work for it night and day."

"John, thank you. You make me very happy and hopeful. If we take things over this year, we may not only keep our standing, but also add greatly to our influence. And, John, don't let this place run down. I don't want Zeiton to get the better of me in this matter; but don't have anything to do with them—nothing whatever."

John readily promised. The next day his father left for Greece, and he went at once to the front in the daily fight in Mincing Lane. He was a man sure to fail and weary in small routines, but a born great trade developer, great resources and untiring energy; and Sam made him believe that the very existence of the house of Ximines depended upon his personal oversight and influence.

It was about a year after his father's departure for Zante that Sam said, one warm evening in June, "Mr. John, you had better run down to the country and see after the place. A change will do you good, and now that you have got the better of Zelton about those olives, there is nothing pressing for a week."

So John went to the country, resolved to lie and dream under the blossoming lilacs, and throw all care away. He was fully carrying out this intention one warm, sunny afternoon, when he heard a little stir of conversation, and the rippling music of girlish laughter. This side of the garden adjoined a little wooded park, through which ran a rapid brook famous for its excellent trout fishing. As it was strictly private ground, he wondered who were the trespassers, and quietly moved aside the foliage to look.

His pleasure at what his view was a very pretty one. Upon a rocky elevation, shaded by a drooping larch, stood a beautiful girl, with a fishing-rod in her hand, and at her feet reclined the splendid-haired woman whom he had known as governess to the daughters of Sir Thomas Oakes. She was reading, while her charge whipped in bathing waters with a grace and skill John, Jun., had never seen equalled.

John looked and wondered and admired. He knew the governess, and had once been half in love with her beauty, but now he thought her hardly worth a look in comparison with her companion. Who could she be? His recent contest with life had taught him to be prompt and self-reliant, and he soon decided that it would be a very agreeable thing for him to join the ladies upon the rocks.

There was a little wicket further down. He opened it and at once faced the intruders. There was no retreat for them, and they had indeed no alternative but the governess was glad to see her old admirer. She came to him with outstretched hands, and the little maid-en with the fishing-rod stood in beautiful and blushing confusion. Then he heard her name—Leonora Zeiton—and for a moment his father's charge flashed across his mind; but in the next he had looked in Leonora's face and forgotten it.

Such a charmed afternoon as that was! John prolonged it by every possible device. He induced the ladies to come into the garden and eat strawberries; then they rambled through the greenhouses, and got lost in the hazel nuts and filberts in the home-wary way, till the governess, in alarm, pointed to her watch, and said there was barely time to reach home before the dinner-bell rang.

Without any definite arrangement, those pleasant meetings occurred every day for a week. John was so deeply in love by this time that he put Mincing Lane out of his thoughts altogether. He did not write to Sam, and he felt that Sam would not write to him, at least for a month. But one morning, just eight days after he had met Leonora, he found a letter on the breakfast-table. Sam said "he must come to London at once; everything was involved in confusion; there was important consignment from Greece, and some Custom-House business which could not be managed without his personal influence."

This summons, in spite of his disappointment, flattered him very much. He left Leonora's governess read it, for John knew that she would talk about it, and he was quite aware that Leonora was very sharp in her worldly suspicions, and this happy Christmas visit was only the prelude to that grand wedding which took place three months afterward in St. George's famous Church, and when the handsome Anglo-Greek bride and bridegroom were the theme of every tongue.

"A very suitable wedding, indeed," said the magnates of Mincing Lane—"unites two fine estates and two old firms."

A very handsome, loving couple," said John Basil to Sam; "and it is your doing, old friend."

"Yes," said Sam, cheerily, "it is my doing. I have made a good merchant and a good match."—Harper's Weekly.

Disraeli's Devoted Wife.

Disraeli's name is on every tongue just now. But how many know of the rare devotion of his wife, who, though fifteen years his senior, loved him with a tenderness seldom equalled, cheered, consoled and encouraged him in defeat, and partook of his joy and exultation in success? It was his habit to prepare his speeches with great care, to study them closely, and, just before leaving home for the House of Commons, to read them through for the last time. After this final reading, during which he became utterly absorbed with his topic, he never wished to be spoken to, feeling that any interruption would disturb and disarrange the current of his thoughts. When the hour for starting came, he would go silently to his carriage, his wife taking a seat by his side, but neither uttering a syllable. Arrived at the House, she, who never missed hearing him speak, would go to the gallery set apart for the wives of members, while he would make his way to his place and there remain unobserved until the time for his speech arrived. That over, he went directly to the gallery to receive his wife's congratulation and applause, dearer to him than that of the hundreds of adherents who hung upon his words. On one occasion, just as the pair were leaving home, when the footman closed the door of the brougham, the lady's finger was caught and held. The pain was excruciating, but no token of suffering escaped her. In silent agony she rode to the House, went to her accustomed seat in the gallery and listened to her husband's speech, and it was not until he came to her, after it was over, that he knew of the accident. We may smile at this over-strained heroism, but we must respect the woman who preferred to suffer rather than risk her husband's success.—Cor. Boston Transcript.

MISSING men—bad marksmen.

AT LAST.

Upon the earth a pilgrim wandered slowly
In search of treasures hid from mortal sight,
Yet granted unto those whose lives were lowly,
Whose faith was infinite.

He had his visions, full of life and sweetness,
That opened like a flower in his soul,
And bade him hope for splendor and completeness
Where he attained the goal.

He stretched his hand to pluck a dainty blossom
That might a wealth of luxuriance impart,
But when he pressed it closely to his bosom
The thorn pierced through his heart.

Still young and hopeful, even though late was
He firmly walked across the desert sand,

A wealth of life and color, gleamed away
In swift eclipse, and left the pilgrim holding
A worthless lot of clay.

"Since here and now I see," he said (poor, patient mortal!)
"To me the highest blessing of this life
I can but wait, and hope in some fair region

He journeyed on until the day's declining
Brought him at last the pearly gates ajar;
And there, in view was one the glory shining
From a radiant face afar.

The goal is reached! The door of Heaven unfolds
Earth's fetters loosen at each struggling breath;
And near the Sunpeak, lonely one reposes

Prom all the disappointments and denials
That were his bitter portion in the past,
From all life's cares, anxieties and trials,
He has found Rest at last!

Weep not that mortal has become immortal;
Born whence there's no change nor death, a glorious portal

John Basil Ximines, Greek merchant, of Mincing Lane, London, was in trouble. Not financial trouble, for the old house stood on a firm foundation; and no one knew this better than Sam Postlethwaite, confidential bookkeeper of the firm, and the old and trusted friend of the Greek merchant. Therefore, when he saw John Basil in so anxious a mood, he resolved to know and to share his annoyance.

"Master," he said, "you're in trouble. What is it?"

"John, Jun.," was the prompt reply. "He takes no interest in the business, and if he comes to the office, grumbles and blusters, and you are glad to see him leave things. You know it is so, Sam."

This side of the garden adjoined a little wooded park, through which ran a rapid brook famous for its excellent trout fishing. As it was strictly private ground, he wondered who were the trespassers, and quietly moved aside the foliage to look.

His pleasure at what his view was a very pretty one. Upon a rocky elevation, shaded by a drooping larch, stood a beautiful girl, with a fishing-rod in her hand, and at her feet reclined the splendid-haired woman whom he had known as governess to the daughters of Sir Thomas Oakes. She was reading, while her charge whipped in bathing waters with a grace and skill John, Jun., had never seen equalled.

John looked and wondered and admired. He knew the governess, and had once been half in love with her beauty, but now he thought her hardly worth a look in comparison with her companion. Who could she be? His recent contest with life had taught him to be prompt and self-reliant, and he soon decided that it would be a very agreeable thing for him to join the ladies upon the rocks.

There was a little wicket further down. He opened it and at once faced the intruders. There was no retreat for them, and they had indeed no alternative but the governess was glad to see her old admirer. She came to him with outstretched hands, and the little maid-en with the fishing-rod stood in beautiful and blushing confusion. Then he heard her name—Leonora Zelton—and for a moment his father's charge flashed across his mind; but in the next he had looked in Leonora's face and forgotten it.

Such a charmed afternoon as that was! John prolonged it by every possible device. He induced the ladies to come into the garden and eat strawberries; then they rambled through the greenhouses, and got lost in the hazel nuts and filberts in the home-wary way, till the governess, in alarm, pointed to her watch, and said there was barely time to reach home before the dinner-bell rang.

Without any definite arrangement, those pleasant meetings occurred every day for a week. John was so deeply in love by this time that he put Mincing Lane out of his thoughts altogether. He did not write to Sam, and he felt that Sam would not write to him, at least for a month. But one morning, just eight days after he had met Leonora, he found a letter on the breakfast-table. Sam said "he must come to London at once; everything was involved in confusion; there was important consignment from Greece, and some Custom-House business which could not be managed without his personal influence."

This summons, in spite of his disappointment, flattered him very much. He left Leonora's governess read it, for John knew that she would talk about it, and he was quite aware that Leonora was very sharp in her worldly suspicions, and this happy Christmas visit was only the prelude to that grand wedding which took place three months afterward in St. George's famous Church, and when the handsome Anglo-Greek bride and bridegroom were the theme of every tongue.

"A very suitable wedding, indeed," said the magnates of Mincing Lane—"unites two fine estates and two old firms."

A very handsome, loving couple," said John Basil to Sam; "and it is your doing, old friend."

"Yes," said Sam, cheerily, "it is my doing. I have made a good merchant and a good match."—Harper's Weekly.

Disraeli's Devoted Wife.

Disraeli's name is on every tongue just now. But how many know of the rare devotion of his wife, who, though fifteen years his senior, loved him with a tenderness seldom equalled, cheered, consoled and encouraged him in defeat, and partook of his joy and exultation in success? It was his habit to prepare his speeches with great care, to study them closely, and, just before leaving home for the House of Commons, to read them through for the last time. After this final reading, during which he became utterly absorbed with his topic, he never wished to be spoken to, feeling that any interruption would disturb and disarrange the current of his thoughts. When the hour for starting came, he would go silently to his carriage, his wife taking a seat by his side, but neither uttering a syllable. Arrived at the House, she, who never missed hearing him speak, would go to the gallery set apart for the wives of members, while he would make his way to his place and there remain unobserved until the time for his speech arrived. That over, he went directly to the gallery to receive his wife's congratulation and applause, dearer to him than that of the hundreds of adherents who hung upon his words. On one occasion, just as the pair were leaving home, when the footman closed the door of the brougham, the lady's finger was caught and held. The pain was excruciating, but no token of suffering escaped her. In silent agony she rode to the House

An Astonishing Fact.

A large proportion of the American people are to-day dying from the effects of Dyspepsia or disordered Liver The result of these diseases upon the masses of intelligent and valuable people is most alarming, making life actually a burden instead of a pleasure, existence of enjoyment and usefulness as it ought to be. There is no good reason for this. If you will only lay aside prejudice and skepticism, take the advice of your Druggist, Geo. W. Cummins, and your friends, and try one bottle of Green's August Flower. Your speedy relief is certain. Millions of bottles of this medicine have been given away to try its virtues, with satisfactory results in every case. You can buy a Sample Bottle for 10 cents to try. Three doses will relieve the worst case. Positively sold by all Druggists on the Western Continent.

Memphis—Scenes in that Desolate City.

Whether one sits to his house or wanders about the deserted streets, to scan death in every direction, from which there is no escape. The epidemic of 1873 was thought to be a visitation of unparalleled magnitude. But those who bear the brunt of that struggle speak of it as a holiday in comparison with the epidemic of 1878. There is only grief apparent everywhere to-day; for those who fled the city when the crisis came, as also those who remained, have lost relatives and friends promiscuously.

The hours of the plague have invaded the cottage of the poor and the palaces of the rich in equal proportion. The poor have not been exiled to bear the burden alone; rich men escaped contact with the pestilence by flight, but they left an heritage of infamy more to be dreaded than the narrow hole in the ground which contains all that was left of the victims of disease. One of the daily papers struck a peculiar chord the other day when it commented as a curse to Memphis greater than the plague itself those fugitives who have not contributed one dollar in money or one word of sympathy to aid and encourage the men fighting the greatest epidemic in the history of the city. And it is true. Even when I hear of all daily, is absent at an Eastern watering-place, and from the rents of squares of buildings on Main street contributed as insignificant sums. Talk with the promise that when the Howard Fund reached a certain limit generous hearts replenish the exchequer with a further donation.

REPULSIVE SCENES.

Latterly the mortality has been proportionately greater among the colored population than white, their ignorance, filth, and in these cases the repulsive scenes which characterized the epidemic when at its height are duplicated. During the last week a physician, while on his rounds, had his attention attracted to the ragged condition of affairs at once, and measures were taken to remedy the evils which, if permitted to continue, would have resulted in a resumption of the plague with all its horrors.

Another physician was called to visit a family of colored sufferers residing on the outskirts of the city. The family was composed of the parents and several children, ranging in ages from one month to fifteen years. On the person of the poor, with nothing to alleviate their distress with which all of them were down. He did what he could for the unfortunate family, who were penned up in a narrow, close, ill-ventilated apartment, and while making his investigation, discovered that one of the children, a boy about seven years of age, had been dead for several hours, and was fast being converted into a mass of corruption, breeding a nuisance insufferable, and filling the air of the neighborhood with the seeds of disease. He was the only parents present who was free from the prevailing complaint, and was obliged to remove the neighborhood through a tempting room for help to effect a removal of the corpse. After a prolonged and almost fruitless effort, he procured the services of a negro, who, with the assistance of a neighbor, placed the remains of the body was rolled up in a sheet, taken to an outhouse and left until the storm ceased, when a rough grave was prepared and the body interred without a penalty bundle.

LACK OF BURIAL FACILITIES.

The difficulty experienced in procuring prompt burial has by numerous been remedied, and funerals are kept waiting for graves to be opened. The earth is removed from the beaten in many instances to enable that country relative to fill another appointment, and the relatives, often without a clergyman to perform the sad rites of the burial service, are obliged to wait until the last resting-place of a departed parent, son, daughter, brother, or sister is prepared. The same rule applies in regard to the services of an undertaker. His engagements are arranged in accordance with a ability to execute the one that it is to no means unusual for a body to be kept forty-eight hours before being collated. Last Thursday a man named Mozingo, who possessed some local fame as a spiritualist and necromancer, died suddenly, and notwithstanding the efforts made in that behalf, it remained unburied until yesterday, decomposition meanwhile having taken place, and creating a panic if not new cases in the vicinity of his residence. As heretofore stated, the papers are buried by the municipal authorities, and no time, by reason of the exigencies of the case, is wasted in getting them out of sight.

Many a mournful drama from real life is enacted among the worthy poor, and if ever a history of the epidemic is written it will be fruitful with touching reminiscences of the dark days that now hang about the City on the Bluff. One came under my observation yesterday, which is a fair type of the kind, and its recital to a party of gentleman at the dinner-table of the Peabody House brought tears to the eyes of more than one who heard it. A very worthy widow lady, who had been surrounded by comfort, if not luxury, in better days, had her family reduced by the disease to a little daughter, whose turn came when least expected, and resulting fatally, left the poor mother alone in the world, the sole survivor of what had until recently been a happy family. Her means were exhausted, and the thought of a pauper's burial being forced on her maternal heart to bear. When the child was dead, the grief-stricken parent detailed the condition of her affairs to a resident gentleman, who has been one of the truest friends in his misfortune, and asked if something could not be done to spare her this additional pang. She responded to the demands of her Father in heaven, she said, in giving her last child to God, but if she was to be laid away by strangers' hands and fill an unknown pauper's grave, her mother's heart would be broken. The good pastor, appreciating the depth of feeling which prompted this last request, appropriated money for the dead child's burial, and Friday afternoon the innocent was laid away in the shade of a tree at Elmwood.

A terrible calamity befel Dr. Paulmanus and his lovely and accomplished daughter Eleanor, Tuesday evening, in Williamsburg, Pa. It seems that a couple of weeks ago two tramps captured a pair of enormous reptiles, which the doctor pronounced to be of the deadly species known as "blowing viper." The doctor having a desire to contribute something that would commend itself from this district, purchased the reptiles, intending to forward them to the Zoological Garden in Philadelphia. Biding their transportation, the snakes were placed in a large glass jar, the top being carefully secured by a covering of wire gauze. The jar was then placed on an elevated bracket in a remote corner of the doctor's office. Last evening the doctor and his daughter were returning from a visit to the country, and, the doctor having occasion to make up a prescription, they both entered his office, the doctor lighting a lamp. And now comes the terrible denouement. A large owl swept in through the transom above the door, and flew with the speed of an arrow against the lamp, knocking it over, and scattering the oil and broken glass in every direction. The bird seemed frantic. Dying and dashing in every direction, while a general crashing of bottles and glasses was heard on every side. Meantime the doctor had lit another match, but just in time to receive his daughter, who sprang, with a wild cry, to his arms. In the darkness he gathered his darling to his arms, and in a moment realized the situation. The owl had dislodged the jar from the bracket, and the vipers were at large. Speedily he grouped his way, calling loudly for help, which, the hour being late, was slow to put in an appearance. They seemed slow, but scarcely five minutes elapsed until full a dozen ladies and brave men were on the spot. No living hand can indite the horrors of the next few minutes. Miss Eleanor, who had been insensible since she sprang to her father's arms, unaware being caused her by the ladies, when one simultaneous shriek almost froze the blood and paralyzed each nerve—but not all! It was Thomas Lutz's hand that seized the glittering reptile by the neck and checked its fearful tangs apart. It had taken the lady unlike between the ankle and the knee. She was now was carried immediately to her home, where every known antidote for poison was administered by her frantic father, but all to no avail. She died at 6:30 o'clock this morning. After taking the poor unfortunate young lady home, one of the men, knowing there had been two snakes, returned to the office and soon dispatched the other. An examination showed its two large fangs missing. This led to the conjecture that possibly the doctor had been bitten. A hasty return and close examination resulted in finding the fangs in the thick leathers of the doctor's boots, who, being so alarmed for his daughter, had not the slightest knowledge of being struck. The corpse of the young lady has swelled to enormous dimensions, while her complexion is in harmony with the spots and general coloring of the snake. The larger of the snakes measures four and a half feet, the smaller four feet. They are pronounced by our old people the largest of the species. Under the shorter one of the two that bit the young lady.—Altoona (Pa.) Tribune.

—On Tuesday Mr. James L. Dubois, who has built nearly half of Marlborough Village, N. Y., paid a visit to his brother Isaac on the Latthitown road. Returning home toward nightfall, he came by the way of Graves' dye-works, and as he was passing the upper pond a large spotted snake sprang up from behind a clump of bushes and bit him under the right eye. Mr. Dubois grappled the reptile by the neck and hurled it from him, but as he grasped it the snake fastened its fangs in Mr. Dubois under the ear. On his reaching home remedies were applied, and by midnight the swelling on his face and neck had been reduced. Yesterday he was ill, suffering severely but no fatal results are anticipated.—Kingston (N. Y.) Courier.

Use Simple Words.

A certain class of people, generally not distinguished for their knowledge, either natural or acquired, have a habit of applying the loftiest sounding names they can think of to every-day objects. Many good honest people are puzzled when they hear their agricultural neighbor speak of "bovines" and "equines," and when they read in their farm paper about "porcine profits," they never dream how much hog is involved in the profits aforesaid.

The other day a high-toned farmer friend of ours was conversing with another friend, also in the soil-tilling business, and, in the course of conversation, he spoke of his "apiary." Friend No. 2 listened attentively, but asked no questions. After the departure of No. 1, No. 2 said to us, cautiously:

"Do you suppose that's what ails his fingers? He had it wrapped up. I wouldn't ask him, but I thought maybe it was a new-fangled word for a whitlow."

To-day, in one of our daily newspapers, we have read advertisements, to the number of half a dozen, headed respectively:

"Boy in each" &c.

Why in earth should this distinction be made? Why not advertise for a saleswoman? or else treat the men equally as well, and give them as high-sounding a title, and advertise in this way:

"Salesgentleman wanted."

We notice this disposition at inequality of titles among lecturers and clergymen. It prevails to a great extent. Public speakers almost invariably appeal to the young men and the young ladies. They call upon the men and the ladies to join them in their work.

Is it a higher compliment to call a singer a lady than it is to call her a singer? Is the word sermonizer any more expressive than the good old-fashioned Bible word, preacher?

Physicians are somewhat prone to mystify their patients with large words. An old lady went to a noted physician to see what could be done for a very troublesome bunion on her foot.

The medical man examined it, pronounced for it, and remarked that "the duration of the cutlet" had taken place. The old lady heard him with dismay. She went home, made her will, arranged her business, gave directions for her funeral, and went for her minister: "for," said she, "it is of no use thinking to do with such a case of disease as that must be, judging from the name."

The best educated people avoid far-fetched phrases. Our pleasantest conversers are those who make the least pretensions.

To be agreeable, one must be natural, and it is not natural to talk to our household in words of five or six syllables.

And if we would make ourselves intelligible to the people we associate with, let our yea be yea, and our nay be nay, and the ears of our friends will be salved by so much simplicity.—Kate Thomson, in N. Y. World.

One of the Latest Snake Stories.

In the Town of Hague, on the banks of Lake George, opposite Hulett's Landing, has lived for a long time a man and his wife, the full name of Mr. and Mrs. Reuben Davis. This couple have occupied a log cabin, which has been situated near the water's edge. The place has been known as the "Rattlesnake Man's House," and many visitors have made excursions to the spot to see this singular-looking couple. They have made a living from rattlesnakes, by capturing many of the reptiles, and obtaining the oil, which brought them a handsome price. At this cabin might always have been seen large numbers of these reptiles. The old man, who is now about sixty-five years of age, caught them with a long pair of wooden tongs, which he quickly and dexterously grasped them with just below the head. He then either killed them outright or else removed their fangs, and rendered them harmless. He possessed power to charm them also, it is said. In fact, he once informed the writer, who visited his cabin, that "thar warn't a varmint that crawled but wot I ken make 'em lay down as quiet as a lamb."

The oil man had about his premises a large number of snakes, which he exhibited to visitors, expecting and receiving many a nickel or dime in return. He never visited a village without carrying several of his odious specimens with him, which he would draw from his pockets and pull over his neck, or fondle and handle them as if they were kittens. By these exhibitions he picked up a good many coppers.

Many wonderful stories are told about "old Ruse" and his wife, the latter being as much of a curiosity as her husband. We have been told that the very shanty swarmed with rattlesnakes, the occupants not having any fears whatever of them.

The land on which the shanty stood was lately purchased by Bishop Seymour, of Illinois. The owner has tried repeatedly to get the Davis family to move off, but the old couple have refused until lately, when the Bishop threatened to eject them by legal process. He finally offered Davis ten dollars to leave peaceably, and the old man, his wife and a boat load of snakes left one day last week for Harbor Island, about a mile south of where the cottage was situated.

Safety of Railroad Traveling.

Some time ago we referred to the reports of the Railroad Commissioners of Massachusetts, on the marvelous immunity from accident railway passengers had enjoyed in that State for the twenty years or more covered by the reports.

A similar fact showing the safety of railway travel is brought out in the report made to the Connecticut Legislature by the Railroad Commissioners of that State. There were carried in 1877 in that State 4,294,015 passengers, which is an average distance each of five miles or 212,700,000 who travelled one mile. Out of the immense number there was but one killed. That one was found near a bridge, and is supposed to have walked off from the train. So even for this one death the railroad company was not directly responsible.

Contrast this immunity with what might have been reasonably expected to happen in the old days of stagecoaches. The Hartford Courant, which appears to have given a great deal of time and study to the investigation, says it would have required 425,000 coaches, 5,000,000 horses and 425,000 drivers to convey those passengers, and at an average rate of eight miles an hour it would have taken thirteen days for the coaches to pass a given point. Who that remembers anything about the dangers of travel in the old times can believe that but a single accident would have happened?

Old sailors in a fierce storm thank the Lord they are in a steamer vessel instead of on the "old hooker," being forced on a pauper was too much for maternal heart to bear. When the child was dead, the grief-stricken parent detailed the condition of her affairs to a resident gentleman, who has been one of the truest friends in his misfortune, and asked if something could not be done to spare her this additional pang. She responded to the demands of her Father in heaven, she said, in giving her last child to God, but if she was to be laid away by strangers' hands and fill an unknown pauper's grave, her mother's heart would be broken. The good pastor, appreciating the depth of feeling which prompted this last request, appropriated money for the dead child's burial, and Friday afternoon the innocent was laid away in the shade of a tree at Elmwood.

On Friday the torch was applied to the premises. When the fire began to spread, a terrible sight met the eyes of those present. It was a sight that caused the beholders to flee in terror for safety. Hissing rattlesnakes and squealing rats poured out of the building from all directions. As the hot flames sprang toward the roof, the crackling of the dry boards mingled with the rattle of scores of maddened serpents and unearthly yells of reptiles. The very roof seemed to be alive with venomous reptiles, and the bright green and white of their outside covering shone with a glare as the flames lit upon them. One of the men, who was a close eye-witness of the scene, says: "One large snake, about seven feet long, opened its mouth, and out came at least two score of little reptiles, whose little tails shook in the air as if they, too, were frenzied at the destruction the flames made of their home. Several snakes charged madly upon the flames only to fall back limped to death; while the rats that could get away took to the woods. In one place a projecting log was made the object of attack by three large reptiles. As the trio charged madly upon it, a great sheet of fire, whose forked tongues were even more poisonous than those of the snakes, rolled around and seized the reptiles, causing them to cease rattling, and in a few moments rendered them harmless. He possessed power to charm them also, it is said. In fact, he once informed the writer, who visited his cabin, that "thar warn't a varmint that crawled but wot I ken make 'em lay down as quiet as a lamb."

In the lives of all there are doubtless great crises, grand opportunities, marked epochs. But he who waits for them, will be ill-prepared to name them and grasp them when they come. The strength to pass through them nobly and worthily must have accumulated little by little in the patient round of petite struggle of every-day life. He who fails here, will surely fail in greater things. If we neglect our trifling opportunities, we shall lack the power to embrace the more important ones. Chances are lying open to us every moment of our lives. We need not wait for them; they are waiting for us to profit by them. If we will watch through a single day, we shall doubtless discover scores of opportunities of both doing and receiving good, which we have purposely hitherto passed by in indifference; and by diligent assiduity in seeking for and embracing these, we shall be prepared to encounter the fiercer storms of life that may await us, or to take advantage of the future that may open for our good.—Chicago Commercial Advertiser.

INCIDENTS AND ACCIDENTS.

—A negro child at Montgomery, Ala., having been bitten by a dog, his mother proceeded at once to fill the wounds with the hair of the animal. It took the surgeon some time to clean them so as to apply the proper remedies.

—Mrs. Lewis Carbaugh, of Union Township, Adams County, Pa., had her right hand amputated recently to prevent the spread of mortification caused by the sting of a cattish, which she was in the act of cleaning. For a week or more her life was in imminent peril.

—At Pittsfield, Mass., a railroad man, having paid his fine and costs for drunkenness, pleaded with the court to have his name kept out of the papers, and that so earnestly that when the Judge asked him also to what he had forgotten the name he had given, and was compelled to ask the clerk who he was.

—At San Angel, Mex., last month, six ladies and three gentlemen assembled to open a box said to contain Lourdes water and rosaries. They took off one cover and found another inside; this they removed and it disclosed a zinc plate; they started to rip that off, and then there came a burst of thunder-gound and only one person was left alive in the room. The box had concealed nitro-glycerine.

EDITOR SENTINEL:

The nominee for Representative of this District on the Greenback ticket, while on an electioneering tour to your village saw fit to make certain statements in regard to myself that were false in every particular, simply for the purpose, as I believe, of increasing his chances in the coming election. If all the citizens of Charlevoix county were as well acquainted with me as those living in the immediate vicinity of your village, I would not take the trouble to thus deny Mr. Mitchell's statements, but as I am comparatively a stranger to a majority of the residents in the southern part of your county, I deem it a duty that I owe to myself and friends to take this means of denying the statements of my honorable (?) opponent, charging me with having pledged my self, if elected to use every effort to secure certain legislation. I desire to brand these statements as false in every particular. The only pledge made by me of any name or nature, was the pledge which I made at the time I was honored with the nomination, which was to the effect that if my nomination should be followed by an election, I would try and represent the interests of the whole district, without reference to any particular party or locality. I did not enter into this campaign with the expectation of securing my election by making pledges, or by slandering my opponents; and rather than to do either one or the other, I will suffer defeat. I would much rather suffer an honorable defeat than to gain a dishonorable victory. Yours,

CHAS. J. PAILTHORP.

From Horton's Bay.—Our correspondent at Horton's Bay sends us the following item: "Desiring to give their pastor, Rev. Mr. Heath, an expression of their respect and good will, about sixty met at the residence of A. J. Stroud on Wednesday, the 23d inst., and after a delightful evening spent in music and conversation, refreshed by that indispensible accompaniment, a bountiful supper, retired, leaving Mr. Heath over $20 in money and donations. Appreciating the value and influence of social gatherings, we hope this is but the inauguration of more to come.

The Greenback is the child of Republican patriotism. Born of rebellion and cradled in the conflict, it was the star of hope and promise of redemption to struggling liberty. Persecuted in its infancy by the Heroes and High Priests of Pemberacy, who sought the young child's life, it was feered for allegiance by the Pendletons; buffeted for vagabondism by the Vallandighams; mocked with a crown of rags by the Thurmans, and crucified by Copperheads and partizans on the cross of treason, and now in its reascended estate and glory of matured strength, the bondmen to whom it gave freedom, the heroes to whom it gave victory, the patriots to whom it restored the country, have sworn that its old arch enemy shall not crucify it anew by substituting the worship of their spurious gold; but receiving from gratitude a crown of gold and silver, it shall reign Prince of Peace as it was Savior in War.—Judge West's Speech at Hillsboro, O.

It makes no difference how many Physicians, or how much medicine you have tried, it is now an estimated fact that German Syrup is the only remedy which has given complete satisfaction in severe cases of Lung Diseases. If is true there are yet thousands of persons who are predisposed to Throat and Lung Affections, Consumption, Hemorrhages, Asthma, Severe Colds settled on the Breast, Pneumonia, Whooping Cough, &c., who have no personal knowledge of Hoofland's German Syrup To such we would say that 50,000 Bottles were sold last year without one complaint. How a Life Was Saved—The Reward of Perseverance.

There was a terrible accident at South Norwalk, Conn., twenty-five years ago. The draw over the railroad bridge had been by some carelessness left open, and the engineer, mistaking the signal, dashed on, and down thundered and crashed the train. The loss of life was terrible, and very many were crushed and badly wounded. Even now, after so many years, it is spoken of as one of the great horrors.

People living near by, and others who were attracted to the scene of the accident, worked nobly, and rendered all the assistance they could. Men came in boats, and tenderly lifted the dead and dying bodies from the water, carried them up on the bank, and laid them gently down to be further cared for. Among those attracted to the scene was a middle-aged man, who was a stage-driver, whose route was between New Canaan and South Norwalk. He saw them bringing up on the bank the bodies of those taken from the water, and one body particularly attracted him. It was the body of a fair young girl, and a strange feeling seemed to tell him that she was not dead. He felt of her hand. It was cold and clammy. Placing his ear over her heart he could detect no beating. Yet something within him said she was not dead. A physician, after making an examination, pronounced life extinct, and urged the driver to assist the others in caring for the wounded.

He turned to go, and again that irresistible feeling impelled him to try to save the girl's life. Securing the assistance of two woman, he began a vigorous rubbing of the body. He labored on until the water fairly poured from him. The lazy curiosity-seekers gathered around and said it was a foolish task, she was past helping. Nevertheless, on he worked. No change was observed for half an hour, and his heart began to sink. For the last time he began a desperate renewal of his oxercises alone, for the woman had stopped, and, as he drew himself up to go away, the girl, with a low moan, opened and closed her eyes. With a rush, the blood dashed to his brain, and he almost fainted, and with open-mouthed astonishment the throngs again gathered around. After a little attention she was restored to consciousness, and her life had been saved.

After she had learned the facts she went to her deliverer, and, with tears of joy, thanked him.

She was the only daughter of very wealthy parents, and deep was their gratitude. When the girl took him to her home, her mother kissed him, embraced him and cried for joy.

Her father gave him a handsome gold watch and chain and clothing; everything that wealth could lavish on him was done. He urged to pass the remainder of his life with them; but he declined this, and went back to his own home thankful for their kindness.

This was twenty-five years ago. Regularly every year since then, he has received a present in money sufficient to keep him in luxury for the next twelve months, beside presents without end from these grateful hearts. He has only to express a wish and it is gladly gratified. He lives in his lovely way, and he is an old man now, and slowly draving near to his end.—N. Y. Sun.

Ancient Biography of Methuselah.

What a tremendous boyhood old Methuselah had! He died at the rather advanced age of 969 years, about 900 years more than man's span of life. At that rate, when he was 100 years old he about equaled an ordinary lad of sixteen. He was thirty or forty before his parents bought him a rattle to play with, and he didn't have the measles and other infantile diseases until he was over 100. He was in no sort of hurry about these things, as he had so far to go. We imagine that he was rather a delicate child to begin with, as most people were who live to a great age. We can imagine his mother's anxiety with regard to his delicate constitution, telling Mrs. Brown across the way, on his nineteenth birthday, that she was afraid she "never would be able to raise that child." Generations of men lived and passed away while so was going around in petticoats, and he almost a centenarian before he got into his first boots. His father used to pick him when he was 150, for robbing a neighbor's watermelon patch.

Young Methuselah was probably it the vicinity of a hundred years old when he was first sent to school. We can imagine him sitting on the low bench, learning his a-b-abs, among the great-great-grandchildren of people who began life when he did. He was mischievous, of course—all boys are, no matter what their age (we experience a mild frightness ourself occasionally), and had to be punished for it.

"William Henry Methuselah, stand up!" says the teacher, catching him in the very act of placing a bent pin in a seat where a schoolmate was about to sit down. "What do you mean by such conduct as this?"

"You would think?," continues the teacher, sternly, "that you wasn't over seventy-five or eighty years old by the way you behave. Instead of that you have already celebrated your first centennial—almost a young man, in fact. You ought to be ashamed of yourself."

Then Methuselah is condemned, as an explation, to "sit among the girls" until recess, and if you think that isn't an agreeable form of punishment you will have to ask some one older than Methuselah.

Whenever a circus came to town, with "children half price" on its bills, young Methuselah must have experienced difficulty in making the ticket-seller understand that he was entitled to go in on a half price ticket, particularly after he got along toward his two-hundredth year. But he probably did it. Boys are enterprising and persistent where a circus is concerned. And we will bet that Methuselah, in his youthful days, could accumulate as much old iron as the next boy, and lay it by for the coming show.

When this youngster got into his teens—say from 200 to 300 years old—he probably did as other young gentlemen of tender age do, went around with the girls. It must have been a little embarrassing to him, after bending a young lady about a spell—taking her fruit of pure native and the highest to concerts, parties, balls, etc.—to discover that she was a great-great-great-great-granddchild of some old friend of his father's, but these things were inevitable under the peculiar and exceptional character of the circumstances. They could hardly be otherwise. There is no record to show that any woman lived in his time to an age that would begin to compare with his. And if there had, the world would never have known it. At least, not from her. She wouldn't have acknowledged to anything over forty had she lived twice the age of Methuselah.

Employing the proportion of twenty-one to seventy to Methuselah's years, we find that he was a minor until he was 270 years old. If the laws regarding minors were enforced in his day, young Methuselah must have been run out of billiard rooms and shut out from bars for over two centuries. And what a sensation must have been created when he stepped up to deposit his first vote. Of course he voted for all the Presidents, from Washington (whom he remembers shaking hands with) down. All old men did that. And when he got to be along in years, say 900 or such a matter, he could sit and tell the boys about the hard winter of '32, and the panic of '37, and the flood of '49, and the hard cider campaign of '40, and all that sort of thing. This is all we have to write at present of Methuselah, the original "oldest inhabitant."—Cincinnati Saturday Night.

Boys Led Astray.

Two young lads of about sixteen, in some farm neighborhood of Indiana, had fired their imaginations, last spring, by reading sea-stories, until they resolved that they would no longer waste their lives in plowing and foddering stock, but would launch out on the briny deep to engage in battles with pirates, to rescue shipwrecked ladies to be embraced by Admirals and promoted to Captaincies on their first voyage, after the usual course of affairs with sailors—in dime novels. They begged their way from Indiana to New York. There, on the Courtlandt street ferry-boat, they had their first glimpse of the ocean.

They stared at each other in dismay. "It's an awful wash of water, Jim!" said one.

"Let's go home," said the other, after a pause.

They were arrested as vagrants, but when their story was known some charitable gentleman sent them back to their plowing. Their uncomfortable experiences had quite extinguished all desire for sea-life.

We can hardly open a daily paper without finding cases in which the utterly demoralizing boys' newspapers, sold at every news-stand, or the equally pernicious dime novels, have led boys into crime and misery.

In New York, last week, two boys of about eleven, who belonged to Christian families of high social position, were found to be out of their beds at two o'clock in the morning. A terrified search was made, and the father of one of them met the boys swaggering up the street. When he spoke to them, his son replied by firing a pistol at his head. The ball missed its aim, but the boy was arrested.

"What could induce you to stout at your father?"

This lad had been carefully guarded against other evil influences but that of his pernicious literature, which had literally maddened him.

The Superintendent of the Pennsylvania Eastern House of Refuge declares that the majority of its inmates are brought there by the influence of these publications. Openly obscene books, he says, reach very few children; but respectable parents permit their boys to buy those flash papers—even buy them for them. Next comes the lagging for the variety-shows, and once admitted to those hot-beds of vulgarity and vice, the headlong descent into crime soon follows.—Youth's Companion.

D., so long and so favorably known in Boston as editor and proprietor of the Watchman and Reflector, now the Watchman, has just connected himself with and taken charge of a new paper published in Brooklyn, N. —Motto for a health-lift: "Pull your tissues."

Real Merit Will Win.

History furnishes no example of anything but merit winning in the end. Bubbles float easily and lightly upon the air, and sparkle very beautifully in the sunlight, but they float but for a moment, and then burst and are forgotten. Society has its bubbles, business circles have their bubbles, the church has its bubbles, life is full of bubbles, but their fate is the fate of the bubble in the air. Occasionally a Fisk bursts upon the community, dazzles for a day, and then dies and is forgotten—leaving the record of a life that no sensible man or boy would wish to imitate. There is no real merit in such a life—nothing that the world wishes to tie to or remember.

The only life that is a success is the one made up of actions which are the fruit of pure motive and the highest sense of duty to ourselves, our fellows and our Creator. Such motives and such deeds make character that will stand all the storms of temptation and evil that may ever beat upon life's pathway, and will win the approbation of every soul whose good opinion is worth anything. There is no meteoric glitter about such a life—it is the constant, modest twinkling of the star. It develops as the grain in the field develops, and not as the mushroom grows. It quietly heads the magnificent harvest of good, and is often as modest as scarcely to be noticed, until it has been garnered in death. The very best lives that have ever left their impress upon the world have been so modest that they were scarcely noticed until they had set, and then the brilliant glory was as glorious and attractive as a horizon painted by a setting sun. The work of life is to do good, and no good was ever done that was lost; it is as lasting as eternity. If men would be successful they must be something, and not appear to be something.

Sensible men feel as a friend of ours expressed himself a few days since. He is the father of a beautiful and accomplished daughter, who was betrothed to a young man of character and some supposed wealth. Before the wedding-day arrived, however, the young man, without fault of his, was overtaken by misfortune, and he was forced into bankruptcy and left without means. He went immediately to the father of the young lady, explained the situation to him and offered to release the young lady from her engagement. "So far as I am concerned," said the father, "you can go right along; I did not give you my daughter because I thought you had money;" and some time after he gave the reason of this decision to some of his neighbors who were expressing surprise that he should have consented to the alliance, in her the circumstances. He said: "Gentlemen, it is not every day that a man gets a son-in-law who does not drink, who is not profane, and who is honorable, upright and industrious. I had no fear, and no doubt, as he remains as he is now, he can share with me my last dollar."

It was character that won here, and although many fathers would not have had the courage to act as sensibly, in their inmost heart they would despise themselves for not doing it. The world admires merit and does honor to character, and every time it neglects to act in accordance with its real feelings, it feels that it is a traitor to itself and the best good of society.—Western Rural.

Enemies of Ocean Cables.

THE amount of submarine life that comes up on a cable which is taken up for repairs after being immersed for a year or two is surprising. Three years ago the writer was with a repairing expedition on the Para to Cayenne section of the Western and Brazilian Company's cables. We were chiefly at work off the Island of Marajo, in the estuary of the Amazon. The cable had only been submerged about a month; yet it came on board the ship at places literally covered with barnacles; at others overgrown with submarine vegetation, crabs and curious shells, often of singular delicacy and to the cable somewhere in their crevices of mud and yellow algæ, slender, transparent, feathery grasses, red, slimy fucoids and tufts of sunshine moss. We found branching and coralline plants upward of a foot in height growing to the cable, the soft secretion being covered with a fleshy skin, generally of a deep orange color. Sometimes a sponge was found attached to the roots of these corals, and delicate calcareous structures of varied hues incrusted the stems of all these plants, and served to ornament as well as to strengthen them. Perhaps there seems to be as rife under these soft, tepid waters as it is on the neighboring tropical shores. Many star-fishes, zoophytes and curious worm-like protaceans were likewise fished up on the cable. The crabs were often themselves completely overgrown with the indigenous vegetation of the bottom, and so were scarcely distinguishable from it. Others, though not so covered, were found to have the same tints as the vegetation they inhabited, and even in structure somewhat resembled the latter. Others, again, were quite fleshy or partially transparent; and one most beautiful hyaline crab, new to science, united in its person several of the prevailing colors of the bottom, its slender limbs, like jointed filaments of glass, were stained here and there of a deep topaz brown. Its snout, pointed like a needle, was of a deep scarlet; its triangular body was of a deep yellow; its eyes were green; and its tiny limbs of an amethyst blue.

Within a day after this cable had been laid a mysterious fault had occurred, and this we were in pursuit of. To our surprise, we found it to have been caused by the bites of some voracious fish. About thirty miles north of the Para mouth of the Amazon we found the cable bitten in many places, and in some so severely that the iron guard wires had been forcibly crushed aside, the cable penetrated to the conductor, and pieces of the animal's teeth left sticking in the core. Instances of cables having been damaged by the sawfish were known before, both by us and doubtless by our readers. The saw-fish grabbing with its snout in the mud is supposed by Frank Buckland to encounter the cable; and becoming enraged at it, to deal it a sharp downward stroke with its saw, thereby piercing the cable from above, and in certain cases leaving its broken teeth jammed between the wires. But the bites we cut out were evidently due to another fish, for they showed signs of having been made by a direct bite between a pair of powerful jaws. Pieces of teeth were found both on the upper and under side of a bitten place, showing that both jaws had been at work. Of what the fish really is which tries its teeth on such expensive prey, nothing is certainly known.

Fish are not the only large animals which have tried to make a meal or a plaything out of a cable. Underground cables have been found eaten by both rats and mice. In Bristol, a year or two ago, a company of rats made their way into the gutta-percha covering of the street cables. Not long since, at Dewlish, a mouse built her nest and reared her progeny in one of the telegraph poles, and apparently supported both herself and her household on the gutta-percha of the wires. No doubt, as the current passed at times while she was gnawing, the little creature felt a tickling sensation of the palate, which fairly puzzled its tiny understanding, and possibly disturbed its innocent feast.

A curious submarine accident occurred a few years ago to the Persian Gulf cable. The cable suddenly broke down faulty. On examination of the fault was localized by some shore tests, and a ship dispatched to raise the cable and repair it. It was duly grappled; and, after a great deal of labor, caused by the extraordinary weight of the cable in hauling up, they succeeded in raising it to the surface, when they found, much to their amusement as well as surprise, that they had caught a whale." The body of a dead whale was found entangled in the coils of the cable, where the animal had died and strangled itself.—Harper's Weekly.

Half the Fine Went to Him.

A Belgian bridegroom, being about to start for Paris on his honeymoon tour, was informed by his bride that she had thought of concealing several thousand francs' worth of lace about her person, and thus evading the octroi duties; but that, on second thoughts, she had decided to declare it, and pay the duty, hoping by its sale to pay the cost of their journey. The bridegroom was not smitten with this frugal project, and insisted that the lace should be concealed. The bride, however, was inflexible, and the bridegroom left her to her own devices. On arriving at the frontier the husband reflected that if his wife were not searched his fears would be mocked at as having been groundless, and he would start on his married career with prestige impaired. This was not desirable. The rather was it essential that no should, from the very outset, assert his infallibility. So, when the train stopped at Ecouelines, and the passengers alighted, the bridegroom left the bride's arm for a moment, and, sidling up to a douanier, whispered: "I think if you search that lady yonder you may find some lace." The douanier winked; the happy bride was accosted with an invitation to walk into the female searcher's room; she turned pale, hesitated, but was led away, and five minutes later dismal sounds of hysterics were heard. The douanier reappeared and said to the horrified husband: "Thank you, sir; it's a good capture. The lady will be taken to prison, and half the fine will go to you."

—A few days ago Mrs. George Hoffman, of Vesper, N. Y., sent her fourteen-year-old son to buy some arsenic. She met the boy on the road home. She examined the poison he had obtained and told him to go home, and that his father had not eaten his supper to put a quantity of the drug in his tea. If tea was over, the boy was charged to put the poison in his father's breakfast tea. The boy found that his father had been killed. Next morning he escaped some of the arsenic in his father's tea. Shortly after drinking it the old man was taken sick. He sent for his wife. She would not go to him. The boy who had given the poison then came for his mother. He told her his father was dead. She started home. On the way she said to her son, taking him by the neck: "If you ever say a word about this I'll kill you the first chance I get." The boy did tell what had been done, however, and he and his mother are in Jail.

—A twelve-year-old boy recently stole a horse in Clover Valley, Cal., rode her clock ten miles and completed his outfit by stealing a saddle, bridle, blanket and revolver from a miner's cabin. He had made up his mind to become a robber, but was arrested while lying in wait for a stage coach.

Fish as Brain Food.

THERE are many men of many minds and many fish of many kinds, therefore there must be a fish adapted to each particular mind.

For the critic—Carp.

For the office-seeker—Plaice.

For a shoemaker—Sole.

For a carpenter—Saw-fish.

For a smoker—Pipe-fish and whiff.

For a lumber cheese manufacturer—Smelt.

For a sea Captain—Skipper.

For dwarfs—Minnows.

For old topers—Suckers.

Then there is the archer fish for archers, the drum-fish for drummers, the pilot-fish for pilots, the skate for skaters and the homely fish for fishers. If a dict of either of these fishes does not increase the quantity of "gray matter," it hits might be drilled in the skull and a fish called the "whiting" inserted.—Norristown Herald.

A Mighty Hunter.

It has not fallen to the lot of many men to slay nearly 600 tigers—to say nothing of smaller game—in a lifetime, even when one's whole energies have been devoted to such pursuits. M. d'Harancourt, a Frenchman, who has been pursuing the avocation of a "hunter" in all parts of the world, claims to be the "greatest tiger killer in the world;" and having achieved this reputation, he is now, it appears, reclining on his laurels in the dignified position of Tiger Slayer in General of the Government of the Straits Settlements having been engaged, so it is reported, to destroy those animals at £10 per head. An English officer in his claim to the title of champion tiger killer. During the last few years Maj. Probyn has also no less than 400 tigers in the District of Khandeish alone, and the immunity from the ravages of these animals which he has secured for the inhabitants of the district has even overcome the suspicion with which the natives too often regard any Englishman who kills a tiger. The destruction of these felines is looked upon by certain classes as an act of sacrilege, and to shoot a tiger is to take upon oneself the vengeance of the village community for the act. Maj. Probyn, however, having partially rid the district of the presence of these unwelcome visitors, is rewarded by thousands of acres of land in the form of "assignments," which he is made over directly, and in such single lots as may suit his convenience; that is to say, either in one piece or in several, as he may prefer. There is no mistaking it. He makes the way of the settler pleasant and easy, as his slain can testify.

Harvesting Potatoes.

"Well," says many a reader, "don't anyone know how to dig potatoes?" If they do, but few of them practice it. Many dig them with sharp hoe, and cut and slash them generally. A potato cut by digging should never be sent to market, nor be eaten after it has lain a week. It is a mistake of a wound. Potatoes should be dug when the ground is dry, on pleasant days, and exposed to the sun and light as little as possible. Exposed for a week by laying on a barn floor or in a pile in the barn, they are not worth half price. They grow in the dark, and to keep them right they must be kept in the dark. When put in a cellar that is not very dark they should be covered to keep out the light.

Potatoes should not only be dug carefully, but handled carefully. The invention of the steel scoop was unfortunate for potatoes. If handled with a scoop, it should be a wooden one. They must not be thrown or poured so as to bruise them. Pouring from a basket into a barrel is injurious, without it is done with care. And the practice frequently resorted to of conveying potatoes from the wagon by a shute into the bins in the cellar should not be tolerated by any careful man.

Digging should be done with a plow, or, if by hand, with a potato-digger, or a broad-tined fork. The Irishman usually takes a sharp-pointed, long-handled shovel, and, if trained, he does it delightfully.—Iowa State Register.

LAST year in Massachusetts 12,737 couples were joined in the bond of wedlock. Of these there were 9,915 bachelors who chose maidens to be their wives, and 508 who chose widows; while 1,396 widowers married maidens and 818 married widows. From this it appears that 788 more widowers than widows were married maidens, and that 1,396 maidens married widowers, when only 608 bachelors married widows.

THE proper way to take vacation is as we go along. A day of recreation or a couple of hours or, so every day devoted to rest and entire forgetfulness of business cares, will sandwich labor so pleasantly and healthfully that strength will be preserved and life invigorated to a remarkable degree.

Or CHILLS and FEVER.

The proprietor of this celebrated medicine justly claims for it a superiority over all remedies ever offered to the public for the SAFE, CERTAIN, SPEEDY and PERMANENT cure of Ague and Fever, or Chills and Fever, whether of short or long standing. He refers to the entire Western and Southern country to bear him testimony to the truth of the assertion that in no case whatever will it fail to cure if the directions are strictly followed and carried out. In a great many cases a single dose has been sufficient for a cure, and while families have been cured by a single bottle, with a perfect restoration of the general health. It is, however, present, and in every case more certain to cure, if its use is continued in smaller doses for a week or two after the disease has been checked, more especially in difficult and long-standing cases. Usually this medicine will not require any aid to keep the bowels in good order. Should the patient, however, require a cathartic medicine, after having taken three or four doses of the Tonic, a dose or two of BULL'S VEGETABLE FAMILY PILLS will be sufficient.

The genuine SMITH'S TONIC SYRUP must have DR. JOHN BULL'S private stamp on each bottle. DR. JOHN BULL only has the right to manufacture and sell the original JOHN J. SMITH'S TONIC SYRUP, of Louisville, Ky. Examine well the labels on each bottle. If no private stamp is set on each bottle, do not purchase, or you will be deceived.

—Dissolve common salt in water, sprinkle the same over your manure heap, and the volatile parts of the ammonia will become fixed salts, from their having united with the muriatic acid of the common salt, and the soda thus liberated from the salt will quickly absorb carbonic acid, forming carbonate of soda; thus you will retain with your manure the ammonia that would otherwise fly away, and you have a new and important agent introduced, viz., the carbonate of soda, which is a powerful solvent of all vegetable fiber.—Chautauqua Farmer.

—The Mexicans have a method of subduing refractory horses and such as are inclined to run away which might be introduced here with profit. A hood or wicker is so arranged that the driver or rider can by a slight twitch draw it directly over the eyes of the animal, effectually blindfolding him. When this is done the animal instantly becomes quiet, and a repetition of the blindfolding two or three times gradually results in his becoming quiet and docile. Such an arrangement would be a valuable appendage to the headgear of such horses as are disposed to runaway.—Exchange.

—Pickles made after the following recipe are said to be excellent: Put cucumbers, peppers, etc., in vinegar; a lump of alum, size of an egg, to three gallons; thus leave them two or three weeks, if necessary; then pour off vinegar, and let it come to a boil. Having placed your pickles in stone jars (not glazed) or firkins, with layers of grape leaves, cabbage leaves between, leave a week; then repeat, pouring off the vinegar, and boil it, and again another week repeat the boiling. Tie up in thin muslin bags green ginger, horseradish, English mustard-seed, whole pepper, cloves and allspice, and a little garlic; add cassia buds.

Autumn Care of Stock.

The critical seasons of thrift of our cattle and farm stock are the times of the two long grass to hay and from hay to grass—fall or spring. It becomes of great importance therefore to bridge over these seasons to the best possible advantage; and in no way can it be better done than by feeding just previous to and during the transition stages. Many farmers who practice this principle make as great profit from their cows in the fall as at any other season, and get, if we except the first greatest rush and flow, a full average quantity and better quality of milk. In the fall there are pumpkins, which are one of the best milk and flesh producers and sustainers when judiciously fed in connection with other feed, as cornstalks and other matter abundant at this season, which it is impracticable to store into winter. Much of this costs very much less to produce than the hay, grain, or other feed stored away for winter feed, and is better for present feeding than these, and will produce more and better milk. Saving it grossly by feeding all other farm stock correspondingly well. Good stock in the fall is a first requisite; the second thing is the second; the regular attendance is the main thing. Any irregularity in attendance is sure to crop out and tell the tale. If our stock pass the transition of spring and fall safely, there is usually no trouble to be apprehended during other seasons; therefore it is wise to see to it and provide for these critical seasons.

An Astonishing Fact.

A large proportion of the American people are to day dying from the effects of Dyspepsia or disordered liver The result of these diseases upon the masses of intelligent and valuable people is most alarming, making life actually a burden instead of a pleasant existence of enjoyment and usefulness as it ought to be. There is no good reason for this, if you will only throw aside prejudice and skepticism, take the advice of your Druggist, Geo. W. Cheevers, and your friends, and try one bottle of Green's August Flower. Your speedy relief is certain. Millions of bottles of this medicine have been given away to try its virtues, with satisfactory results in every case. You can buy a Sample Bottle for 10 cents to try. Three doses will relieve the worst case. Positively sold by all Druggists on the Western Continent.

A Remarkable Result.

It makes no difference how many Physicians or how much medicine you have tried, it is now an estimated fact that German Syrup is the only remedy which has given complete satisfaction in securing cases as Lung Diseases. It is true there are yet thousands of persons who are predisposed to Throat and Lung Affections, Consumption, Hemorrhages, Asthma, Severe Colds settled on the Breast, Pneumonia, Whooping Cough, &c., who have no personal knowledge of Boschee's German Syrup. To such we would say that 50,000 dozen were sold last year without one complaint. Consumptives try it! Just one bottle. Regular size 75 cents. Sold by your Druggist, thro. W. CHEEVER.

General News Summary.

DOMESTIC.

THERE was great excitement on the New York Stock Board, on the 18th, in consequence of the failure of the firm of Hatz & Co., Wall-street brokers, for $230,000. The partners were subsequently arrested and held to bail in the sum of $80,000 each, to answer to a charge of fraud preferred by William Belden & Co.

THE Concord (N. H.) Savings Bank suspended, on the 13th.

DURING the recent races on the course of the Chicago Jockey and Trotting Club, the horse Hopeful made the unprecedented time of a mile in 2:16½, to wagon. The owner of Hopeful has issued a challenge to all the world for a trial of speed with his horse.

THE October returns to the Department of Agriculture indicate the average condition of the cotton crop to be 95. Compared with October, 1877, the growing crop shows an improvement of 11 per cent. With the increased acreage planted, the present crop promised to produce more than 5,000,000 bales.

DURING the celebration of a wedding in a colored church, at Lynchburg, Va., on the evening of the 16th, the building being densely crowded, an alarm was given that the structure was falling. A terrible panic ensued, and the immense crowd made a wild rush for the doors and windows. The terrible, groans and sight of their immediate attendants were crushed and trampled to death, and from fifty to sixty women and children more or less seriously injured.

THE New York Mutual Life Insurance Company, recently selected at Marquette, while they were being used as evidence in the case of the United States against Samuel J. Tilden, were returned to the office from which they were taken, on the 16th, in obedience to an order of the United States District Court.

CONSIDERABLE anxiety existed at Lincoln, Neb., on the 17th, concerning the safety of two surveying parties of forty men, who were surveying Government lands on the Niobrara River, in the immediate track of the Cheyennes on their recent raid. No word had been received from them for nearly two weeks. A detachment of cavalry from Camp Robinson had been ordered to search after them.

THE returns for October to the Department of Agriculture place the average condition of the corn crop at 96 per cent., an increase of 4 per cent. over the September average. The total yield will not vary largely from 1,800,000,000. The yield of wheat will exceed that of last year, a total of over 400,000,000 being indicated. The oat crop will probably be somewhat larger than the fine crop of 1877.

THERE were held in the United States Treasury at Washington, on the 19th, $948,680,850 in Government bonds to secure bank circulation, $18,290,400 to secure public deposits, and $4,022,000 to secure subscriptions to the 4-per-cent. bonds.

ACCORDING to a Washington special of the 19th, the new plan of registering first-class mail matter, which had been in operation three weeks, had proved to be a great success, and reports from all directions showed that its advantages were appreciated by the public.

SECRETARY SHERMAN stated, on the 19th, that 400,000 ounces of silver would be the amount purchased weekly by the Treasury Department.

IT was feared, at Washington, on the 20th, that the Arctic vessel Florence had been lost off the Atlantic Coast, with all on board, during recent gales. The vessel sailed from New London, Conn., eighteen months ago, for the Arctic Regions, under the direction of Capt. Hodgdon, and was to have been followed by another vessel, with additional supplies and men, but the appropriations asked for not being granted she returned, and was at New-foundland on the 20th ult., and should have reached New London in ten days thereafter. She had a crew of three officers and ten seamen.

YELLOW-FEVER NEWS.

THE only surviving son of Jefferson Davis, Sr., was among the victims of the fever, on the 16th. He was twenty-one years of age. There were eighty deaths within and fifteen outside the city limits of Memphis. The deaths in New Orleans numbered twenty-six; Cairo, two, and three near Cairo; Chattanooga, four, and fourteen new cases. There was a somewhat encouraging statement of the disease in the smaller towns. The situation at Brownsville, Texas, was very discouraging. There had been over 500 cases and 150 deaths to date, and 100 cases were then under treatment. The deaths within the preceding forty-eight hours numbered ten.

A WIRESPRING telegram of the 17th gives news of the death of Lieut. Brewer, of the relief boat Chambers. He died on the morning of the 17th. The announcement of his death caused a pall of sadness over the entire city, and caused a deep feeling of sorrow at Washington and elsewhere throughout the country. He voluntarily accompanied the steamer on its mission of mercy into the infected district, and had expressed the belief that, by his long service in the South during the war, he had become acclimated. He caught the disease by having given up his stateroom to a lady from the infected district, who was at the time herself suffering from the disease, though she may have been unaware of the fact. Lieut. Benner served throughout the war in the Eighteenth Illinois Volunteers. In 1867 he was appointed Second Lieutenant of the Eighteenth Infantry (regulars), and was promoted to First Lieutenant in 1875. It was reported from Washington, on the 19th, that Gov. Shepherd had, with the approval of the Secretary of War, telegraphed to Lieut. Hall to return with the steamer to St. Louis and there put it in quarantine.

FROST made its appearance in many sections of the South on the nights of the 18th and 19th, and ice formed in some localities. There were seven deaths in Memphis, on the 19th, and four on the 20th, six of whom were whites and five colored; six deaths were reported outside the city limits, on the 20th. During the twenty-four hours ending at noon, on the 20th, there were forty-four cases and twenty-seven deaths in New Orleans. It was thought, on the 20th, in localities where frost had appeared, that a change for the better would take place in a few days, by a diminution in the number of new cases.

A TELEGRAM from New York, on the 20th, gives the number of deaths of ministers in the South, by yellow fever, down to that date at fifty-six. Of these twenty-four were Catholics, thirty-one Protestants and one Jewish Rabbi.

IT was reported, on the 20th, that Minister Noyes, at Paris, had forwarded $1,000, and the Emperor William, of Germany, had contributed 3,000 reichsmarks (about $700), for the relief of the yellow-fever sufferers in this country.

WARM weather again prevailed at the South, on the 21st, and fears were entertained that returning refugees in the cities would add new victims to the scourge. There were eighteen deaths in the city and suburbs of Memphis, and twenty-three new cases. At New Orleans the new cases numbered thirty-one; deaths, fifty-four; total cases to date, 13,012; deaths, 3,753. There were two deaths at Cairo, but no new cases. Two more deaths had occurred at Gallipolis, Ohio, and there were also cases under treatment. The Memphis & Charleston Railroad resumed operations on the 21st. Notification was made at Memphis that no more rations to able-bodied citizens would be issued after the 26th. The fever was still prevailing with fatal effect in most of the interior infected towns.

PERSONAL AND POLITICAL.

JUDITH S. MOMBRIA, has been re-elected to the United States Senate by the Vermont Legislature.

IN the New York Herald of the 15th, Maxime Marbie publishes a sweeping denial of the charges connecting him with the cipher dispatches sent to and from the South during the Returning-Board excitement in 1876. He affirms that he never, directly or indirectly, sought, or assented to any scheme, to purchase or secure for Tilden the State Canvassers' certificate of the vote of Florida.

PRESIDENT HAYES was present at the State Fair at Winchester, Va., on the 16th. He was welcomed in a speech by Gov. Holliday, who introduced him to the assembled people. The President responded in a speech in which he alluded to his first personal knowledge of the country there as having been obtained during the rough school of the great Civil War, and to the auspicious circumstances under which he this time visited its people.

On the 16th, the California Constitutional Convention adopted a resolution memorializing the President and Senate of the United States, to so amend the Burlingame Treaty as to prohibit Chinese immigration.

SAMUEL J. TILDEN published a card in the New York newspapers, on the 17th, in which he denied emphatically that he either sent, received or authorized any of the cipher telegrams lately published, and relating to the Presidential count in the disputed States. He says the Returning Boards were known to be corrupt before their acts proved it, and that his election was confessed by the self-convicted participants in the fraud. His nomination and triumph were unbought, and he was untrammeled.

ALLEGING to recent alleged political persecution and outrages in South Carolina, Louisiana and other Southern States, a Washington special of the 20th says the President desired it to be understood that he would protect the colored race in the enjoyment of their rights to the utmost of his power. No effort would be spared to execute the laws and vigorous measures would be taken to bring violators of law to justice.

ADMIRAL PAULDING, Senior Flag Officer on the retired list of the Navy, son of the captor of Maj. André, during the Revolutionary War, and the last surviving officer of the Battle of Lake Champlain, died at Huntington, L. I., on the 20th.

HENRY HAVEMEYER, of New York, denies all knowledge of the cipher dispatches relating to the late Presidential election. He says: "I never sent any of those dispatches, and never authorized anyone to send them, or any of them, for me. I never knew, and do not know, the meaning of the cipher or any of the ciphers, in which they, or any of them, are written, and could not read them if I would. During a short period immediately after the late Presidential election a large number of telegrams were sent to my address for other persons, and called for by messengers. The practice was commenced without my consent, and after a few days discontinued by my requirement, because their frequency rendered them a great annoyance. I never knew the contents of those telegrams."

REV. REV. SYLVESTER H. ROSECHANS, Bishop of Columbus, Ohio, died in that city, on the night of the 21st, of hemorrhage of the lungs.

THE Charleston (S. C.) News and Courier of the 19th, alleges that a Republican meeting at Lautonville, in that State, had been captured by a force of about 500 "Red Shirts," who proceeded to run the meeting on a division time schedule, making several Democratic speeches. The meeting was, it is said, originally composed of about 2,000 men, women and children—mostly colored.

In Pueblo, the mob threatened to break up the Protestant services, killing four persons. President Rev. Dr. Butler to do all in his power to protect all religious denominations.

THE report of the Committee of Investigation into the affairs of the lately-suspended City of Glasgow Bank, published on the 16th, shows that the institution has been recklessly managed, being fruitful in wild and debts and worthless securities. The total losses aggregate $5,760,983, to meet which will require an assessment of £500 per share.

A FEW nights ago, Miss Anna Brown left Detroit with her father to drive home, six miles from that city, on the Grand River Road. In a right wagon drawn by one horse. They had driven about a mile beyond the toll-gate, the father holding the reins, when two men suddenly jumped to the side of the horse and stopped him, after which one of them stepped back and informed Mr. Brown that if he had any money or other valuables about him he would be robbed from them. Mr. Brown entered a protest, saying he was a poor man and had no money, and begged them to let him proceed unharmed. By this time the second highwayman had left the head of the horse and joined his companion, and both were badgering Mr. Brown, telling him that it was useless to affect great physical weakness and poverty, for he must "shell out." Meanwhile the girl had gained possession of the whip and at this point she suddenly seized the reins and, with the heavy butt end of the whip, knocked one of the robbers down, whereupon dashed the other a severe blow. Then, giving the whip to the horse, she succeeded in driving herself and father out of reach of the robbers and beyond danger, although one of the highwaymen discharged a pistol at the flying couple.

NEARLY-SIX Michigan physicians report to the State Board of Health that they know of 1,319 opium-eaters.

MICHIGAN lumbermen are finding out that there are great stores of lumber in the upper peninsula, and the timber thieves are also finding it out.

THE other night, at Detroit, Mattie Farrell came home drunk and was welcomed by her son, forty years old, who was also drunk. A quarrel ensued which lasted far into the night. Next morning he announced to neighbors that his mother was dead, and, the police arriving, he was arrested as her murderer. Her daughter's abode was literally drenched with the old woman's blood, flowing from numerous wounds in her body. The only other tenant of the house was his fourteen-year-old daughter, and she clearly and intelligently related that her father and grandmother quarreled, her father finally throwing down the old woman and kicking her in the head, and afterward stamping life out of her body, the fiffle one illustrating the action by herself lerraging down her own tiny heel.

THE Rev. Dr. Joy, of Detroit, refused to perform the marriage ceremony at the late wedding of Jay Gould, on the ground that the institution has been recklessly managed, being fruitful in wild and debts and worthless securities. The total losses aggregate $5,760,983, to meet which will require an assessment of £500 per share.

INCIDENTS AND ACCIDENTS.

—A few nights ago, at Wilkesbarre, Pa., as four of the miners were endeavoring to disperse an accumulation of gas in the shaft of a coal mine, one of them brought out a naked lamp. An explosion instantly followed, resulting in the death of the entire party.

—At Franklin, Tenn., the other day, John Prewitt shot his own son with a shot-gun, while engaged in a family quarrel. The son begged his father not to murder him, but he mercilessly shot out the eyes and then were rousing through the woods swearing to kill his two other sons who were in the altercation.

—At Woodbridge Center, Conn., the other day, Mrs. Kunz's dress caught fire from the kitchen-stove. Losing her presence of mind she rushed to the barn and attempted to extinguish the flames by rolling over the hay. Of course the barn was set on fire and the poor, crazed creature, horribly burned, ran to the well and jumped into the water and drowned.

—There is a tragedy in the background of the marriage of the Hon. Orson Brooks, of Los Angeles, Cal., which took place recently. The groom is seventy years of age and the bride sixty-three. Forty-four years ago the Judge was the accepted suitor of the lady he has now wed. The relentless purpose of fate separated their young hearts, and the lady and gentleman have both since married twice and lost, he his wives and she her husbands. Something like a year ago their paths crossed again, and the Judge has now married his first choice.—Chicago Tribune.

—Recently a young married couple in New Orleans determined to visit the "old folks," who live in one of the coast parishes, and surprise them by displaying a new grandchild. Accordingly they started for the ancestral home, but when the young man and his fetching wife arrived at the mansion and their advent was announced, the old man, afraid of the yellow fever, peremptorily refused to see his son or his wife or his child, and furthermore ordered them off his premises; and, despite all prayer, remonstrances, they were obliged to depart, greatly chagrined.

—At South Canaan, Conn., a few days since, William Blodgett, an insane person, procured a shovel, and proceeded to the cemetery a short distance to the south of the village with the design of "resurrecting" his brother Milan, who had been buried three years ago. He dug up the coffin and opened it, revealing the sickening sight of the horrible grinning skeleton. He then went a short distance off, and procured a pitcher of milk, by the application of which the "resurrection" was to be accomplished, and remained all night, bathing the skull and other bones with the fluid. He was found in the morning still occupied and talking incoherently to his ghastly patient.

—Baldwin Co., Ga., lately, a party of colored lovers met together and held a mock court, all duly organized, with Judge, jury, lawyer, witnesses, etc. One of the number was tried for some offense, witnesses examined, speeches from their lawyers, charge of the jury delivered, and a verdict rendered by the jury of guilty. The sentence of death was pronounced by the Judge, and a rope was immediately placed around the neck of the criminal, who thrown over some place to secure it and the culprit made to stand upon a chair. The chair was then removed and the victim left dangling in the air until life was extinct. The youthful participants in the court affirm they would have taken him down, but he did not tell them to do so, and they supposed he was kicking his feet for sport.

MARRIED.

MR. JAMES CONRIE, Dentist, is Baltimore, writes: "I have used Dr. Bull's Cough Syrup, personally and in my family, for two or three years, and I am prepared to say that there is nothing to compare to it as a remedy for Coughs, Colds, etc.

RESIGNATION.

Dead! Will you read the telegraph over again to me
That came, in the early morning, from Memphis, Tennessee?
"Died, of the yellow fever, last night, at half-past seven,
Edward, your son." How dark a path is laid to the gate of Heaven!
Nod, my beautiful darling—so gay, so happy and free,
Could not the angels have spared him a little longer to me?
Just one month, this morning, since he came to me and said:
"Mother, dear, darling mother, smile on your wayward Ned,
And say, 'God-speed' to the mission of mercy on which I go."
To give to the sick and dying what comfort we can bestow."
"Not to the plague-stricken cities!—O, Edward, my boy, not there!"
I cried, as his loving fingers smoothed down my thin, gray hair.
"You are my youngest darling; I never can let you go—"
How could I live without you? Others, more wise than you,
Will do more skillfully, better, the thing that you want to do.
Softly, almost unconsciously, came back the feeble reply:
"Some mother's sons, fever-stricken, for want of my care may die.
Think, darling mother, it might have been Benny, or Will, or Jo—"
Or even your husband." Dearest mother, say you will not go."
Yes, he was right; it might have been one of my boys.
Stirred all the mother-instinct and pity in me—tears to my eyes brought.
God would take care of my darling—bring him again to me;
Surely my will could reach him, working so earnestly.
Thus for the good of others, working in God's own way,
So I crushed back the anguish, tho' I could only Brokenly, tearfully: "Edward, kneel with me After our anguished prayer, I kissed him, and left him there.
So he started that evening. Just as he went to start
He said to me: "Dearest mother, keep up a strong, brave heart;
I shall come back in safety and if I don't—well, then We'll start about the same time, God bless you, mother, amen."
"And he has found it!" you whisper. Yes, he has found it, dear;
"Try not to talk of it?" Let me. The all the comfort I know.
Thus to talk of my darling, who cherished his mother so?
First came his letters, written full of a beautiful trust
That God would let him, for many, soften the sorrow and anguish dust,
And so He did—for many a dying message he heard
Never, in all the city, a face he had seen before;
Ah, there's the pang! Among strangers, there I will cry out no more.
Only the thought is so dreadful; pardon a poor mother's moan
Over her son, so brave-hearted, dying alone there—alone.
Only the silence of an army! "The charge of the Light Brigade—"
Storming a battery manned—meeting the foe unafraid—
Storming a battery manned—meeting the foe unafraid—
Dauntless, fearless, brave-hearted, dying alone there—alone.
Storming a battery manned—meeting the foe unafraid—

A JUDGE OBJECTS TO BEING SWORN.

As an officer he was brave in battle, stern and fertile in emergencies, rigid in discipline, yet popular with his soldiers; but at the same time so affable as often almost to merge the command-ant in the gentleman, so kind as to seem weak, such an admirer of women and always so richly dressed that it was written of him, "Had he been placed in the same sphere of society he might have been a second Chesterfield."

Toward even squaws he was so courteous that they soon came to regard him in the most friendly spirit, thus enabling him to impress them with many a Christian sentiment. He made it a point to supply them as much as possible with employment in their particular forte, as Indian embroideries, head work and buckskin moccasins. Many such things he sent across the sea to his English friends, where they were regarded as great curiosities. In the spring of 1763 the Indians were pinched for food, and many of them came and set up their wigwams near the fort, where, until summer, they might subsist upon the patronage and charity of the garrison.

Among others there came with his family a dusky Ottawa maiden named Mowana, an adept in every kind of needle-work known to the squaws.

Maj. Gladwin soon heard of her and her unusual skill, and sent for her to come into the fort as he had an elk skin for her to make up into moccasins.

When she came he found her rightly named Mee-ni, which signifies wild-pigeon, of she was peculiarly delicate and timid for a squaw.

Making known to her, by the interpreter, his want of moccasins, he gave her the elk skin from which, in a few days, she produced a quaint and beautiful pair. So delighted was he with her work that he kept her fingers busy all the spring in one device and another, meantime showing her such courtesies, making her so many presents, and paying her such liberal prices as to quite win her confidence. To gentle Mee-ni there was nobody like the good officer, so brave and refined, and yet so smiling and generous. He was as different from her father and other warriors, who, with their contempt and kingly stature, combined rude manners and often rough words. As events proved, the innocent girl's gratitude and regard toward him prompted her to a noble deed in his behalf.

In the autumn, while the corn was growing in the Indians' fields and the game was increasing and fattening in the woods, a motley crowd of men, women and children from the neighboring tribes, Ottawas chiefly, gathered in the vicinity of the fort for the purpose of having away by the soldiers the trinkets which they had manufactured in their wigwams during the winter and spring. They were attended by the celebrated Pontiac, a great Chieftain, sometimes even styled an Emperor, and all their manners and associations seemed friendly in the utmost degree. Some days of pleasant trading passed, and at length their relations were so agreeable that Pontiac proposed to the Commandant of the fort a council for the purpose of "brightening the chain of peace."

Maj. Gladwin readily assented without a suspicion of harm, and it was arranged that the calumet should be smoked in the morning inside the fort. To show his peaceful intentions and confidence in the whites, Pontiac stipulated that with him 200 unarmed warriors, thus making a most imposing display.

During the day the fort was put in order for the council in the morning. In the afternoon timid Mee-mi made her appearance with some uncommonly fine medicine for the Major; but he, who was strangely reserved concerning how familiar she had become of late.

Ah, there's the pang! among strangers, there I will cry out no more.
Only the thought is so dreadful; pardon a poor mother's moan
Over her son, so brave-hearted, dying alone there—alone.

OUR RADIX LETTER.

New York, Oct. 17, 1878.

Fifteen Sentences.

Since the celebrated Nettlethorpe Bank robbery of a few years ago, nothing in this line has occurred to compare for successful audacity with the Manhattan Savings Bank burglary of last Sunday morning, and it may be safely asserted that never was a case which the entire police force, from the Superintendent to the most humble accepted patrolman, was more anxious to clear up than this. The audacity of the burglars in selecting a bank within a few yards of the Central Police Office, and one in which a very large proportion of the force have deposited moneys, and when was, therefore, watched over with a sort of personal interest by the police, has excited in a remarkable degree the pride and combativeness of the officers, and impelled them to unusual efforts. After the most careful search of the premises not a single clue to the identity of the gang could be found.

Not a trace was left behind, save the costly and ingenious tools with which the work was done; and these, as might be supposed, tell a little, if anything. The success of the gang is pronounced almost marvellous by the detectives, and certainly nothing more audacious or wonderful can be found in the pages of Jack Sheppard literature. That six men, in broad daylight, should enter a bank in one of the busiest corners of Broadway, work for three mortal hours in plain view of any passer by who chose to glance through windows hampering and hanging at the murderous doors of the safe, bag nearly $3,000,000 in cash and securities, and then disappear with their booty as completely as if they had vanished into vapor, is certainly, as incredible a story as ever was spun by the brain of a romancist.

Fortunately for the bank the largest part of the stolen property was either in registered bonds which are of no real to the thieves, or belong to private parties who kept their strong boxes in the bank's vault, at their own risk. It is claimed by the officers that the institution remains perfectly solvent, with a large surplus over any possible loss. Still, I notice that they have taken advantage of the sixty day law, requiring the usual notice before paying deposits. It is hoped that the strenuous efforts of the detectives will this week be rewarded with success, especially as they claim to have some slight clues, which follow ed up must run some of the land pirits to the ground.

This burglary is particularly ominous for Augustus Schell, the Tammany candidate for the mayoralty, over which the hottest kind of that fight is now in progress. Mr. Schell, being a brother of the president of the bank, and himself one of its prominent directors, is of course, set upon by the opposition papers in the regular and approved style of American politics, and the attempt is made by them to make him out responsible for the occurrence. Why shouldn't he be a candidate for local office in this glorious metropolis?

Fired, probably, by the recent example of the would be assassins of Emperor William and King Alfonso, one of our city ruffians attempted, the other night, to slay an American potentate, one of the most illustrious and most majestic of despots—Mr. Shott, a New York Alderman. "They say that the hour that is darkest is the one that comes just before day;" and I suppose that is the reason why the gas companies, who contract to light the city streets from dark to dawn, always turn out the street lamps just at the commencement of that hour. At all events, that is what they do, and in consequence more deeds of violence are perpetrated at that hour than at any other of the twenty four. It was at that time that the unfortunate dignitary in question was walking along an up town avenue when a man sprang upon him from a doorway, stabbed him several times with a long knife, and stole good his escape in the darkness. The motive for the assault is a mystery, for the victim is not known to have any enemies, but to one of the most populiar men on the Board. By what the doctors consider almost a miracle, the vicious knife-thrusts failed to reach a vital spot. In view of which I may be pardoned for regarding the occurrence as not wholly lamentable, for now that one of the City Fathers has experienced in his own sacred person the consequences of having the public streets in such a condition of obscurity as to invite and screen such offences, we may look for a reform where the nefarious hacking of two or three of the corpses in dark would leave but little difficulty in bringing about.

One of the questions now before our heavily-taxed City Courts is as to whether the elevated railroad has any rights which a bill-poster is bound to respect. The latter manner of society seems to leave his bump of reverence but slightly developed. Nature and art have one in close sympathies to his eye. The ink pellet is the vortex of either which appeal to his professional perception are prominence and superficial area. The ash barrel, the fence, the curbstone, and even the dead wall of the unoccupied house fall easy victims to his vandal eminence. But such achievements fall far short of satisfying his vaulting ambition. He yearns to paper all architecture, and is only restrained by the strong arm of the law from covering the brown stone fronts of Fifth avenue, and the marble palaces of Inside with the flaming boards of the circus proprietor and untidy eloquent exhortations to "Vote for Pat Finnigan."

Carried away by his consuming passion, the character of which I have thus briefly portrayed, the bill-poster hailed with fiendish delight the erection of the iron columns, which support the elevated road. He rubbed his hands with glee as his hungry eye peered down their apparently endless vista. He manned his paraphernalia with pails, brushes and dodgers, and send them forth under cover of night. The morning broke. The deed was done. The railroad officials were aghast. Not dumfounded not even bound voice enough to swear by the lip of the longest that they would have refrain. So they rushed into court, in the person of their attorney, Mr. David Dudley Field, and are now pouring forth their tale of indignation and of woe. The case will probably be tried next week.

Gen. Sheridan's Annual Report.

Gen. Sheridan's report to Gen. Sherman relative to the military operations in the Division of the Missouri during the past year, has been made public. The more important and interesting portions are as follows:

There has been no change in the organization of the division during the past year. It consists of the following departments, viz.: The Department of Dakota, embracing within its limits the State of Minnesota and Territories of Montana and Dakota, with twenty-five permanent posts and three encampments of observation, commanded by Brevet-Maj.-Gen. John Gibbon, in the temporary absence of Brig.-Gen. Alfred H. Terry; the Department of the Platte, embracing the States of Iowa and Nebraska, the Territories of Wyoming and Utah and a portion of Idaho, with twenty-one permanent posts and two camps of observation, commanded by Brig.-Gen. George Crook; the Department of the Missouri, embracing the States of Illinois, Missouri, Kansas and Colorado, the Territory of New Mexico and the Indian Territory, and the posts at Fort Bliss and Fort Elliott, in Texas, with twenty-four permanent posts, commanded by Brig.-Gen. John Pope; the Department of Texas, embracing the State of Texas, with thirteen permanent forts and numerous camps of observation, commanded Brig.-Gen. E. O. C. Ord.

To garrison these eighty-two permanent posts and camps of observation, the Government employs four companies of artillery, averaging fifty-three men each, eight regiments of cavalry, averaging 705 men each, and eighteen regiments of infantry, averaging 425 men each, which, as will be seen by the report of Gens. Ord and Gibbon, give us only one man to 130 square miles in the Department of Texas, one to every 200 square miles in the Department of Dakota, and about the same in the Departments of the Platte and the Missouri. When it is borne in mind that this immense section of country has to be constantly under surveillance against Indians and raiding parties from the Mexican side of the Rio Grande, the work that has now to be performed by that portion of our army located on the military division will be appreciated by all military men, and by those who have at heart the good name of the army.

The Indian situation at the present time is, I am sorry to say, unsatisfactory. The Indian Department, owing to want of sufficient appropriation or from wretched mismanagement, has given to the settlements in the Western country constant anxiety during the last year, and in some cases the loss of life and loss of property, attended with dreadful crimes and cruelties. The Army has been in sufficiency of food at the agencies, and, as the cause in question, hunger sits among the Indians in some cases desperate, and almost any two of men will fight rather than starve. It seems to me, with the management, that the amounts appropriated by Congress ought to be sufficient, if prudently applied to the exact purposes specified, and if the supplies are regularly delivered, but the reports of the Department Commanders forwarded herewith would indicate a different result—except in the case of the Red Cloud and Spotted Tail bands of Sioux, who, although threatening in their conduct, have been the best supplied, and have been hemmed until their increasing discontent constantly threatens to bring about a breach of the peace.

The General at length reviews the situation of the Indians 20 years ago, and the causes which have led to their present unhappy condition. At that time their wants were satisfied.

But, alas for the poor savage, along came the nineteenth century progress, or whatever it may be called, to disturb their happy condition. The white men crowded on by the grounds of the Indians and made encroachments on their rights which no Government could stand. One handful of soldiers was at first sent to protect the Indians, but such attempts were powerless. The Government made treaties, gave presents, made promises, none of which were honestly fulfilled, and, like all original treaties with Indians in this country, they were the first steps in the process of developing hostilities. As the latter became jealous, he made in his simplicity blind warfare, as he began to see his lands wrested from his possession. The disappearance of the buffalo, which he believed the Great Spirit had given him capable of sustaining him in peace and antelope killed for the market and by the sportsman, and wild cattle scattered by both, and his rude nature under similar conditions naturally rebelled. He commenced war, war as he had been accustomed to make it, and men, women and children, intruders upon his soil, were killed, the difference being made between the innocent or guilty, the armed or unarmed.

The General then reviews the wars which followed, at considerable length, and suggests what is likely to occur in the near future:

The second outbreak of Indian hostilities is caused in this way. After he has lost his country he finds himself compelled to remain on reservations, his limits circumscribed, his opportunities of hunting abridged, his game disappearing, sickness in his lodge from change of life and food, and insufficiency of the latter, and this irregularly supplied, and the reflection coming to him of what he was and what he now is, and clothed by hunger, creates a feeling of dissatisfaction, which, in the absence of a good strong force of soldiers, starts out on the war-path again, and unarmed people are killed, settlements are broken up, farms are abandoned and general confusion ensues. This condition of affairs is well illustrated by the recent outbreak of Northern Cheyennes, who, dissatisfied with their reservation at Fort Reno, and the ration which he and of the outbreak of the Northern Pieces last year, and certainly of that of the Hunkpapa and Sheetsaurs in this year, of the Cheyennes, Kiowas and Comanches in 1874, and unless wiser measures prevail hereafter it will be so. The Crow will still cause in peat, the Assiniboines and Brooks. Yanctons and whatever tribes are on the Missouri will be drifted to follow. Spotted Tail's and Red Cloud's people will be driven to the war-path eventually, and so on down to the tribes in the western part of the Indian Territory. To prevent or even meet the calamity which may occur we are entirely unprepared, for, without excessive military expenditure, which we can collect together but a few hundred men. For instance, at Fort Sill and vicinity, to meet the Kiowas, Comanches, Apaches and others, located in the Indian Territory, numbering 3,000 or 4,000, we have not more than 400 effective men. At Fort Reno, to guard the Cheyennes and Arapahoes, numbering 5,000 or 6,000, we have not exceeding 300 effective men. At Red Cloud Agency, which, there are at least 8,000 Indians, we have only two companies, and could not in ten days collect over 500 or 600 men. At Spotted Tail's we have only two companies, numbering 119 men, and it would take two weeks to collect all the troops we could muster, and they would not number more than 800 or 850 effective men, while the Indians number 10,000 less than 7,000. And so at all points where there are Indians and agencies, and at other strategical points, the number of troops is insignificant, and if outbreaks occur, as I fear they will, the consequences will be appalling, and I desire to warn the General of the Army that we have not half the troops required to meet these anticipated troubles.

Now that the game, upon which the Indians depend for their regular supply of food, is gone, we shall require a great supply of rations, with perfect regularity in their issue, to meet the needs of these people, together with a strong and stable Government, backed up by a sufficient number of soldiers to enforce a spirit of obedience, and to keep these restless savages within the limits of their reservations.

The General glances at "the benefits which have accrued to progress and civilization by the misfortunes of the poor red man in the last ten years," viz., the construction of various railways, the development of the mineral wealth in Central Colorado and the San Juan country in Southern Colorado; also that of the mines in Utah, Montana, the Black Hills, New Mexico and other points, which developments have thrown into circulation, by the process of labor and the purchase of machinery, and the purchase of machinery, supplies and transportation, millions upon millions of dollars, to say nothing of the millions taken out of the earth by manual labor and the aid of machinery.

Then, again, let us take a view of the cattle interests. Ten years ago our grazing grounds were in Texas, now they are from the southern boundary of Dakota to the Gulf of Mexico, and I may safely say that parts of Wyoming and Montana furnish a range sufficient, if not better, grazing than in Texas, and these lands are covered by improved and better stock. The number of cattle now north of Texas and west of the Missouri River is perhaps fully or nearly equal to that in Texas, and only two years ago there was scarcely a head.

Let us now look at the agricultural developments. Northern Texas has been filled up by thousands of lately enlisted from the South and North. Kansas has had an emigration hitherto unparalleled—the emigration being almost by the hundred thousand per year. Nebraska has also come in for a large share of emigration, while Colorado, Utah and Wyoming are not far behind in acquiring population. Central and Northern Texas, Middle and Western Kansas, and Nebraska and Utah, are all teeming with agricultural prosperity. This population, numbering probably 2,000,000 men employed in mining, grazing and agricultural pursuits, pays taxes, builds farm-houses and constructs fences, plows up the ground, erects school-houses and church villages, towns, etc., and the millions obtained by the sweat of their brow add to such more to the trade, commerce and prosperity of the world; and all this comes from the development of a country which only ten years ago was the land of the Indian, the buffalo and the elk.

The report closes with a brief summary of the general condition of affairs on the Mexican border, with recommendations for the better protection of life and property in Texas.

Annual Report of the Commissioner of Pensions.

Hon. J. A. Bentley, Commissioner of Pensions, has completed his annual report to the Secretary of the Interior, showing the operations of the Pension Service during the fiscal year ended June 30, and making sundry recommendations for the future. A Washington dispatch gives the following synopsis:

The number of new claims of all classes filed during the year was 67,502. Of these, 18,561 were original claims for invalid pensions, being more than double the number of the same class filed in either of the two years from 1871 to 1874; 13,040 were for the War of 1812 service, under the act of March 9, 1872. About one-sixth of these claims were in behalf survivors, the remainder were widows' claims; 45,764 claims were settled, at an average cost to the Government of $10.15 per case. The average cost in 1877 was $12.81, and in 1876 $17.11.

Thinking upon the increased efficiency of the office, including the reduction in the salary appropriation of $68,350 in 1877 over 1876, was $180,000, and in 1878 over 1876, including the reduction in the salary fund of $67,340, was $240,170. The number of cases settled in 1877 was 22½ per cent. greater than in 1876, and in 1878, 50 per cent. greater than in 1876. At the beginning of the year the number of applications for pensions pending, by order of the President, reduced from fifty-eight to eighteen, saving in salaries for the year $142,000. The aggregate saving in the bureau for the year in reduced payment for salaries of all descriptions, and reduction in the number of agencies, was $382,172; adding $180,000 for 1877, the aggregate saving for the two years in these items alone has been $562,332.

On the 30th of June, 1878, there were 223,-998 pensioners on the rolls, a reduction of 5,585 during the year. It is expected that the number of pensioners will considerably increase during the current year, on account of the 1813 pensioners. Exclusive of the Fees of Examining Surgeons, and the fees and salaries of Pension Agents, the amount paid for pensions during the year was $36,580,792. Of this amount, $940,60) was retained from the pensioners and paid to Claim Agents for their fees.

Starting a Boy.

A lonesome-looking boy was yesterday hanging around a wood-yard in the northern part of the city, when the corner of the yard, having both charity and philanthropy for boys with tears in their eyes, approached him and in the kindest possible accents or do something to earn a few shillings. The boy replied that he had no capital, and the wood-yard man took out a nickel and said:

"Now, my boy, I'm going to start you in life. Take this nickel and go and make a purchase of something or other. I'll buy it of you for ten cents, no matter what it is. Come, now, let's see what sort of a business head you have on you."

The boy took the nickel and went off, but in ten minutes was back with a gallon jug, which he had purchased with the nickel.

"Well, you are a keener," replied the man. "I never saw one of those sold for less than fifteen cents to anyone. I want such a jug, and here's its fair price. Go and sell my cut your fifteen cents in apples and I'll buy half your stock."

The boy did not return. Perhaps he fell into a sewer somewhere and the man can't make the wood-yard man believe so. When he lifted the jug from un der the table, where the boy had concealed it, he found a whole in the bottom large enough to let in a black-and-tan terrier.—Detroit Free Press.

Resolutions Adopted by the Prophetic Conference.

NEW YORK, Nov. 1.

The Prophetic Conference held its last session to-day, Mr. Reynolds, of Peoria, presiding. The Rev. W. H. Cravin read a paper on "The Relation of the Pre-Millennial Advent of Christ to the Catholic Doctrine of the Work of the Holy Spirit." Prof. Cooper of the Presbyterian Seminary, Allegheny, Pa., followed with a paper on "The Judgment," and the Rev. N. West, D.D., of Cincinnati, addressed the Conference on "The History of Doctrine."

Before closing this Conference, composed of brethren from so many different lands, we the undersigned Clergy of our Lord, desire declaring whatever doctrines have may be held in connection with the belief of the pre-millennial of our Lord which contend in the faith once delivered to the saints, and witness to the Church universal among the nations, and to assert our position in that work we believe to be the truth of the Gospel which Christ has left to us.

1. We affirm our belief in the supreme and absolute authority of the written Word of God on questions of doctrine and duty.

2. The prophetic words of the Old Testament concerning the first coming of our Lord Jesus Christ were literally fulfilled in His birth, life, death, resurrection and ascension, and so the prophetic words of the New Testament concerning His second coming will be literally fulfilled in like manner. We believe that this earth in like manner as the world up into the ark, and this glorious Epiphany of our glorious God our Savior Jesus Christ is the blessed hope of the entire race of regenerated humanity, the true day of restitution of all things spoken of by all the holy prophets since the world began.

3. That the second coming of the Lord Jesus Christ is every where represented in the Scriptures as premillennial, personal and pre-millennial. We believe that the day and hour thereof is unknown to angels and to men, but known to God.

4. The Scriptures nowhere teach that the whole world is to be converted to God, and that there will be a reign of universal righteousness and peace before the coming of our Lord. Into this earth at and by His coming in power and glory will the kingdoms of this world become the kingdoms of our Lord and the development of Anti-Christ, the times of the Gentiles and supplanting of Israel, the fulfillment of the desire of Cross and the resurrection of His living and sleeping saints, fulfillment and the period of millennial blessedness and transformation.

5. The duty of the Church during the absence of the Bridegroom is to watch and pray, to work and wait, to go into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature, and thus hasten the coming of the day of God, and, to His latest moment, cheerfully answer to the Spirit's glorious hope, "Even so, come Lord Jesus."

The Conference then adjourned sine die, and the whole Conference rising to vote.

Resolved, That the doctrine of our Lord's pre-millennial advent, instead of paralyzing Evangelistic and missionary effort, is one of the most significant incentives to consecration in preaching the Gospel to every creature. "Till He come."

Addresses were then made by Maj D. W. Whittle, of Chicago; the Rev. Dr. Brookes, of St. Louis, and the Rev Stephen H. Tyng, Jr. They all commented on the glorious work and successful conference.

The Rev. Dr. Mackay, of Hull, Eng., made the closing address, which was powerful and eloquent.

After singing "All hail! the power of Jesus' name," the benediction was pronounced by the Rev. Dr. Lord, and the Conference adjourned finally.

Thanksgiving Day.

In accordance with that reason at which it is the habit of our people to make devout and public confession of their constant dependence upon Divine favor for all the good gifts of life and happiness, and of public peace and prosperity, within the year, none of the year abundant reasons for our gratitude, and for the exercise of penitence, and prayer, and pardon, by order of the President, reduced from fifty-eight to eighteen, saving in salaries for the year $142,000. The aggregate saving in the bureau for the year in reduced payment for salaries of all descriptions, and reduction in the number of agencies, was $382,172; adding $180,000 for 1877, the aggregate saving for the two years in these items alone has been $562,332.

"Tickets, John."

"Tickets be blamed," said John. "Get your ticket from the fellow you trolloped around with all day."

This was followed by loud laughter from a number sitting near, some of whom had been watching the girl's movements during the day, and she had to go down into her pocket for the necessary wealth to pay her fare to this city.—Youngstown (Pa.) Register.

The Pig in Agriculture.

The pig has recently been spoken of in contempt when compared with our other domestic animals. But if we examine his good qualities at all critically, we must award him a high place in our agriculture. The American people are thought to consume more pork, bacon and lard per capita, than any other people. The products of the pig are a household necessity, and enter into almost universal consumption. If we suppose 75 pounds, per capita, to be used by our people of pig products, including lard, then our home consumption amounts to at least 3,000,000,000 pounds, worth $150,000,000. The pig then holds a conspicuous place in the food supply of the Nation. But when we examine it as a factor in our exports, we find it to stand at the head of all our domestic animals. A few years ago we had to put up our pork, lard and bacon to suit English taste, and our average export of these articles amounted in money to only $6,000,000 annually. But after studying the taste of our principal customer, and getting the assistance of some English houses in putting up the goods, our exports of hog products rose in 1872 to $21,000,000. During the fiscal year 1876 these exports were as follows:

Live hogs	$670,947
Pork	3,844,622
Lard	12,422,485
Lard oil	182,156
Total	$38,686,163

In 1877 these products reached the sum of $92,352,222, an increase of over $13,000,000 in a single year. But the items of the last fiscal year, ending June 30, 1878, were the following:

Live hogs	$267,250
Bacon and hams	51,750,326
Pork	30,014,000
Lard	4,819,626
Lard oil	964,440
Total	$87,980,572

Now, the entire cattle products exported the same year amounted to $46,388,029; and this includes all our meat trade and dairy products, the latter being $18,162,487; so that the exports of our dairy products, amount to but little more than one-fifth as much as those of our pig products, and the whole cattle exports only amount to 46-100 of the pig exports. These export figures of pig products show what we may do in a few years more. They have doubled in less than three years, and we may reasonably expect them to reach $125,000,000 during the next ten years. We have ample resources for growing and fattening pigs in unlimited numbers and can supply the demand, however much it may increase. And since our products reduce pork, bacon and hams cheaper than any other country, we are likely to have the command of the markets.

The pig is found to produce a pound of product from less food than either cattle or sheep, and therefore is the most economical animal to manufacture our great corn crop into marketable meat. Our people are becoming more expert, year after year, and exporting less, proportionately, of the raw material and more of the condensed product. If it take seven pounds of corn, on an average, to make a pound of pork, as is no doubt the case, the farmer begins to see the great economy of exporting one pound of pork, bacon or lard, instead of seven pounds of corn. The difference in cost of freight makes a fine profit, of itself; health the pound of meat is usually worth more than seven pounds of corn in the foreign market.

The production of pork should be encouraged on the further consideration that it carries off less of the valuable constituents of the soil than beef. The fat pig contains only three-fourths as much mineral matter per cwt. as the fat steer, and only twenty-five as much nitrogen per cwt. And therefore the production of a ton of pork on the farm will carry off only a little more than half the fertility carried off by a ton of beef; beside a ton of beef will require nearly 50 per cent. more land to produce it. This gives pork double value, the comparative effect of producing pork and beef.

It is thus evident that the pig should have a high place in our agriculture; should be fostered in every way—his capabilities studied and pushed—his diseases carefully noted and prevented, for he is the most profitable meat-producing animal on the farm. The pig is an excellent adjunct to the dairy, turning all the refuse milk, and even whey into cash. As he is king of our meat exports, so let us treat him with great consideration.—Rural New Yorker.

INCIDENTS AND ACCIDENTS.

—A farmer of Reno County, Kan., coming across a rattlesnake, tied his reins in a bunch and killed it therewith. Subsequently he untied the knot with his teeth, and the poison thus got into his system and drove him mad.

—A family of emigrants on the way to Texas camped over night in Sedalia, Mo. In the morning the man packed all the things in the wagon to continue the journey, except his aged mother-in-law, whom he left at the side of the road. However, a mass-meeting compelled him to take her along.

—An unknown man applied for a piece of bread at a house in East Fifty-second street, in New York City, the other night, and was refused. He said he was starving, and staggered away with feeble steps. He fell in front of No. 328, in the same street, and when approached he was found to be dead.

—In 1862, a young man of Bastrop, Tex., enlisted in the Confederate army, leaving behind him his sweetheart, a beautiful girl of sixteen. No letters came from him after Chancellorsville, but two weeks ago he returned after many adventures in foreign lands, claimed the hand of the lady, who had remained faithful to his memory, and was quietly married to her.

—Joseph Langendorf, of Chicago, met with a very singular accident, the other day, as he stood in the doorway of a drug store, on North Clark street. Above him, at the second story windows, was a gentleman cleaning a broken window. Suddenly a light of glass descended, cutting off Mr. Langendorf's entire nose, completely severing it from his face. The severed member was promptly sewed on again, and serious results were not expected to ensue.

—Mike Foley was a Montana desperado, and when he said he would kill Mrs. Frederick, she believed it. One day he approached the cabin, and she sent for her husband. Frederick hurried to the house in time to prevent injury to his wife, but received a bullet in his own breast from Foley's pistol. However, he knocked the villain down with a stick. Up to this time, Frederick had not spoken a word, but he announced to the table and, placing both hands on it, said: "I am shot, and cannot live two minutes. Run for your life or Foley will kill you." She refused, saying: "I cannot leave you." He again said: "It is useless, you can do nothing for me—save yourself." Observing Foley getting up, she rushed out of the front door and ran to the railroad and quickly found shelter, and finally escaped. Frederick died.

—None of us can know how we would act in a supreme moment of personal fate. Edgar Allan Poe or Victor Hugo could not have imagined a form of death more completely calculated to fill the timidity's fortitude than the terrible scene which culminated in the life of one John Conlan, at Norwich, last Friday night. Conlan, who was a pitiful coward at the best of times, was on the railway track at Norwich Falls, at a point where there is a double switch, and in front of the engine of the last train of the day he saw a huge locomotive coming down upon him almost instantly. It was not in the power of human nature to move. OUR RADIX LETTER.

EDITOR SENTINEL

A curious little conflict in social art was fought out the other day by the efforts of a woman employed upon the Western Union Building to take down the big red globe known as the "time ball," whose fall from its bottom at the stroke of this towering structure daily informs sporting New York of the moment of noon. The ball having become in some respect defective, was therefore not given as sharp orchestral No. 5 honors, however, had the hands of the brave workman touched the ball than they were stayed by a cloud of lorgnets who had previously entered this dizzy dwelling place, and who, after having gone to the expense of furnishing and fitting up the hollow globe in the finest style known to their kind, by no means intended those summary proceedings. The battle was an unequal one, the lorgnets easily getting the best of it until the time arrived to the besiegers of going below and actually reading and lowering the ball. This movement proved successful. The astonished insects tried for a while to follow the erratic movements of their agile disturber, but soon gave up in disgust and flew off in search of some more stable resting.

I feel like apologizing for again referring to that eternal Vanderbilt will trial, but one bit of the testimony of this week is rather interesting. It seems to be clearly proven that the old gentleman was a confirmed spiritualist, and spent a good deal of time and money on ghostly communications, and it is testified that on one occasion he sought and obtained through a medium an interview with the late lamented Jim Fisk. He inquired the future price of certain stocks, and promptly received an answer, purporting to come from the "Prince of Erie." He appeared highly dissatisfied however, with the prophecy from the spirit world, and expressed his determination to trust to his own judgment instead. After this the Commodore asked Fisk whether he liked his new abode, and delicately inquired after the climate to which Jim gave a somewhat testy reply, to the effect that he didn't quite like his quarters, and that the Commodore would soon have an opportunity to "know how it was himself."

To the long and somewhat monotonous list of defalcations and embezzlements to which this city is the unfruitful contributor, we now add the case of George W. Hoxie, for the last five years Assistant U. S. District Attorney in Brooklyn. As usual, the revelation of the man's misconduct was entirely unexpected, and the culprit well-known and highly respected. From a letter which he sent to the press on the eve of his disappearance it seems that Mr. Hoxie was led into Wall street speculations some years since, and being unfortunate therein, began using in way which came into his official hands, and has ever since pursued the same system of peculation. At last, finding longer concealment impossible, he writes a letter of confession and absconds.

What sameness there is in all these stories of weakness and crime, and what a mystery it is to those of us who have never been subjected to similar temptations, that men of intelligence, ordinary ability, or refinement, of high family and social standing, can enter, or having entered, deliberately pursue a path that is thickly strewn with the moral corpses of their predecessors, and the ruinous end of which lies plainly and unmistakably before them?

Carver, the riflesman, turns up an elegant nose at the Creedmoor style of shooting. He says that he got to meet the deer or Indian who would feel it an honour to be asked to stand at ease and wait for an enemy to drop upon his back, cross his legs, push the butt of his rifle against his right cheek, clasping the stock with his left hand thrown behind the head, rest the muzzle over his knee, adjust his wind gauge and elevation before pulling the trigger. Carver is of the opinion that six well mounted Indians would have eleven scalps in his belt during the time occupied by the Creedmoor riflemen preparatory to firing both back to the leisurely raised pistol and with a limp leg and arm go limply away. But the difference between opinion and target shooting, and when Jackson, or Jewell, or Fulton lifts the ladies' eye he accomplishes precisely what he attempted to do, whether he assumes a position he thinks take or not.

Neither should a critic lose sight of the fact that there is no short hour item of evidence than rifle shooting. Nerves with a view improving by discipline can hope to emulate. The hand must be steady and the eye and judgment clear, for without these requirements no man can hope to enter the lists as a successful rifleman.

Every now and again somebody turns up here with a story about a terrapin which he or she is about to come into the "long haul" child, relatives or descendants of some old Creasy who has been dead for many yrs. The publication duly reared with a glowing account of the claimant's claims and prospects, and then one whom matter drops out of sight, the claimant usually being a lunatic or an imposter. We are just now going through one of these periodical attacks. The hero in this case is a bluff and weatherbeaten old sailor named Morgan, who has come all the way down from Maine to look after a little trifle of $1,500,000 which he especially belongs to him as heir of some old chap who lived in New York the best of the memory of this generation, and which he will doubtless get—when the sky falls.

It may or may not be a source of satisfaction to your readers to learn that the much mooted question as to whether there is or is not a place of eternal punishment has been settled at last.
